HUNTING THE BEAR.

An Incident in the Career of Alexander Tremblay—Famous Hunter Was Fooled by His First Bear.

"The life of the professional hunter and trapper, while naturally attended by a certain amount of danger and hardship, is not utterly devoid of amusement. It is, perhaps, true that such men are more easily amused than the jaded brain-worker and mechanic in our modern centres of civilization, and what affords entertainment to one might not appeal to the other. For instance, Mr. Alexander Tremblay, the well-known hunter and trapper of the Larry Sound district, would sooner spend twenty-four hours in the woods than the same length of time in a theatre, though the latter might offer a bill to which even the heart of a callous first-nighter would respond with something akin to enthusiasm. Tremblay, on a recent visit to Toronto, went to see a performance which had been received with favor by the critics and the public. It was a play about a hunter and a bear. The hunter, the crowd's favorite, was the artificial light and the close atmosphere were not to his liking. The only incident in the whole show that gave him any pleasure was a clever act by a number of trained dogs, and that only because he was confident that some of the canines would have made good hunting dogs had they been trained from their puppyhood to 'the great game'."

Peeped by His First Bear.

And some of those that heard sympathized because they understood, and those who did not quite catch his meaning joined, with the others in demanding just "one more story." He told more, and was pleased to tell still another, pieced out at times by the comments and interjections of several who had witnessed with him some of the incidents he related. His first bear, "hee's very fir," fooled him, he says, with a merry twinkle of his deep-set eyes. It occurred when he was wandering through the northern wilds of Quebec with the Indians who had adopted him, or whom he had adopted, "just what you like." He was at this time about thirty years of age, and a proud possessor of a musket, the first firearm with which he had been entrusted. Behold, then, not much taller than his weapon, and eager for adventure, setting off on his first lonely hunt. With every step strained he walked along, scanning the ground and brushwood for a trail. At last he found it—that of a fair-sized bear. With heart beating high he followed it, until at last he found the animal, a bear of the male persuasion, vigorously tearing at a rotten log. Child as he was, the inherited instinct of the hunter came to his aid and checked a sudden desire to give vent to his vigorous whoop. Carefully he aimed and fired, and the shot found its home in bruin's shoulder. Mad-dened with pain, the animal thrashed wildly with its forepaws for a few moments and then started to run. Tremblay reloaded and followed. Tremblay's loaded trail was easily read for a considerable distance, and then hard and broken ground was reached; the signs grew fainter, and at last were altogether lost. For two or three hours the lad searched, keen disappointment and hope alternately, in his heart, until at last his perseverance was rewarded and he found the bear lying close to a fallen tree. There flashed through his mind stories of the cunning of wounded animals, and he approached cautiously, halting to fire another shot at the traitor bear. Not yet satisfied he fired again. Both shots found a mark near the bear's shoulder, and the animal made no sign. Tremblay's imagination, however, was in full working order, and he was confident that bruin had moved a paw and blinked an eye. He waited for stronger signs of vitality, and then, in order to make assurance doubly sure, threw some stones at the animal's head. Still the bear lay low, and at last young Tremblay walked boldly forward and laid a hand on bruin's side. "Heem's near cold quite," he says when telling the story, "an' heem's die of the first shot. What's dat for hee's (I) been fool?" Tired as he was he covered the animal with the heaviest stones he could lift, and returned triumphant, but with aching limbs, to the tent of his Indian friend, Bokko. In the morning the whole family moved to the spot where the carcass lay, and did not leave it until the last edible morsel of bear had been disposed of. It would be a very Solomon of bears that could fool Alexander Tremblay now.

Rheumatism..

is Uric Acid in the blood. Unhealthy kidneys are the cause of the acid being there. If the kidneys are healthy, as they should be, they would strain the Uric Acid out of the system and rheumatism wouldn't occur. Rheumatism is a Kidney Disease. Passing Charm of Piccadilly.

Piccadilly, one of the most famous thoroughfares of the world, has arrived at the stage of its history when at least a part of its old-time individuality, the individuality that gives it its charm and fame, must go, perforce, the way of all things human. The congestion of traffic along its narrow way has become so great that nothing short of widening will reduce it. At the eleventh hour a plan to cut a road through the Green Park from Hyde Park Corner to Cleveland Row, which, by diverting all the eastbound traffic destined for Charing Cross way, would solve at least a part of the problem, is brought forward, but with results indecisive as yet. It would save Piccadilly, but at the expense of will incline eventually remains to be seen. It is a dilemma not without its pathos for the lover of vanishing London.
