charged His Majesty with a bayonet. In my opinion it was the heavy and lambering character of the sabre bayonet alone that sayed the King. He was just grazed, he afterwards told me, on the left of his abdomen. An efficer pushed his borse against the assassin, who was knocked down and secured. For the moment the conduct of the King was admirable. He drove at orce through Naples in a small phaeton, with no escort—a thing which he had not done for many months. He threw open his pulsee to receive all who came to congratutate him on his escape. His apartments were crowded, and the King moved through the throng, speaking to every one. Addresses ramed on the pulsee from all the provinces, of both the Sjeitles. Then came reaction. In the February following the attack I had another audience of the King, who was then in his great palace at Caerta. I went by command. Two miles from the palace my carriage was surrounded by a patrol of mounted cavalry. When they learned who I was they did not search the vehicle, but detacted a couple of soldiers to accompany it. Before the great west front of the palace account of the In my opinion it was the heavy and of the palace stood a tine of infantry. Everything betokened a siege.

The aspect of the King binself was that of a hunted animal. We all know what followed. In 1856 the King said to me, "I do not know why we should not both live for forty years," On the 22nd of May, 1859, he was dead. Dead, po doubt, of a disease not unknown to physicians; but killed, in real truth, by the change of the Chasseur Milano, from the shock of which the pervous system never recovered.

Now, I can't help thinking that what I saw at Naples in 1856-59 must be taking place in Russia at this hour. Any long continuance of such a state of stension is, I think there can be no doubt, impossible.
