"Oh! he was drownded!" whispered the little fellow, in an awe-stricken voice, and looking exceedingly shocked.
What is your mamma's name?" he asked,

The Real Cup o' Kindness

"No not let the little girlrob herself," said his mother, in a voice of tender caution.

"No; she made me take them; and—oh, mamma I have seen her mamma; she was here just now—such a lovely lady! And Virgie says she lost her pape when she was a little baby—he was drownded."

"Drowned, you mean, Willie," corrected the lady; "how sad! but perhaps you ought not to talk about it, dear," she added tenderly, as she bent forward and softly stroked Virgie's glossy hair with her jeweled hand.

Catarrh in the Head

"Margaret, and it means a pearl." Papa sometimes calls her his "pearl of great price," moaned Virgie from behind the traperies, as she caught these words, "a pearl of great price, indeed."
Just hen a door midway of the corridor opened and another lady came slowly down the lofty hall.
She was tall and commanding in figure, not so slight or graceful as Virgie, but possessing a sweet and gracious dignity that was exceedingly pleasing.
She was a perfect blond, and her beautiful golden hair back of her head. Her eyes were bue, her cheeks delicately tinted with pink, and a rare, winning smile, played about her sweet mouth. She was a dressed all in white. A robe of some soft white material was made en traine, any attained with a profusion of white satin ibbons. She wore an elegant set of opals arrounded with diamonds, and was truly a beautiful and distinguished looking woman. Her face gleamed with indefinite tenderness as she drow hear the children.
"Why are you still playing together!" she sked, as she stooped beside them; "you seem inclined to be very friendly."
"Yes, Virgio is a very nice girl to play with," returned Master Heath, with the air of one paying a great compliment; "and see what she has given me, manma," he added; holding up a handful of toys.
