

of Trinity College, having held during that time the office of Professor of Classics. I have great pleasure in bearing my testimony to the cordial coöperation which I have always received from him, both in carrying out our system of instruction, and in the maintenance of discipline. I greatly regret that his intention of marrying obliges Mr. Ambery to relinquish his appointment in the College, as we have always worked together most satisfactorily, and as I have good reason to appreciate highly the services which he has rendered to the institution.

Should he obtain the appointment which he now seeks, I am satisfied that he will discharge its duties with great efficiency, and that, in his management of boys, he will discover a firmness blended with kindness which will secure to him at once their respect and affection.

GEORGE WHITAKER, M.A.,
