

Strong in it's truth

The two extremes in newspaper character are sensationalism at the sacrifice of veracity, and truthfulness at the occasional sacrifice of excitement. Sensationalism wins with some, but truthfulness wins with the majority. The Mail and Empire is strong and honest, progressive and truthful—the best type of the metropolitan daily and the sturdy advocate of the Conservative party

Strong in News

Every effort is made and no expense is spared to secure all the news. The undoubted superiority of the service during the Spanish-American war and the Boer-British war are types of news triumphs repeated in a smaller, but none the less emphatic, way in every issue of the Mail and Empire

Strong in Views

The Mail is loyal to it's duty to the Conservative party. Day in and day out it is an organizer and a lecturer, faithful to the party's best interests. A true party promoter without the Mail is as helpless as a minister without his Bible or a student without his lexicon.
