far behind us indeed. Our wants have multiplied and new inventions and living have combined to make living expensive, in the money sense, for individuals and for cities alike. The individual vigorously seeks more individual vigorously seeks more income, and the city, the province and the Dominion—the state for its own purposes, for public services and for admane of wants and of taxes man is prone to forget that the best things in life are the cheapest, if rightly sought, and some of the cheapest things are, properly understood, health, contentment, the serene frame of mind, that independence which comes from wanting little if a greater independence cannot be had, a reasoned enjoyment of the gifts of nature, the sun, the air, the beauty of wood and of water, the changing fascination of the heaves, the joys of the family, courage—in short, the natural joys of living. These are beyond the reach of the tax gatherer, but, as so many philosophers have reminded us, and still do remind us when they can get our ears, we are too prone to forget or to ignore the simple things except on rare occasions when we turn from the more sordid struggles of our world and contemplate.
