The subject on which the remarks of the speaker were based was principally patriotism. The different phases of the national welfare, including the moral improvement of the British Empire during the past century, compared with other nations, and its commercial progress were all dealt with. He introduced his remarks by referring to the personal character of the lite Queen, emphasizing her influence upon the charmed circles of home and the whole family life of the nation, Glancing briefly at the Empire's progress morally and materially, he said: We have always believed on the whole that England has at the Empire's progress morally and materially, he said: "We have always believed on the whole that England has sought first the Kingdom of God and His righteousness, and that as a consequence all these things have been added unto her. It would not be impossible to show how much of her mervellous accretion of wealth and power in recent times have flowed directly from a large and general obedience to the laws of God."

Continuing, he compared the area of the British Empire with that of other countries, mentioning the fact that she covers one-fifth of the habitable globe, and showing that Great Britain was three times the size of the United States, and forty times the size of Germany.

He went on to refer to the marked improvement in the condition of the masses. Surgical and medical science and the introduction of sanitary legislation had brought about a material decrease in the death rate.

It was taken to Fusan by Japanese fishermen, and was in the beginning confined to the Japanese, but naturally soon after spread amongst the Coreans too, and cholera amongst the Coreans is extremely difficult to control, owing to their utter negligence of all sanitary precautions. Thus, for example, instead of burning the corpses as the Japanese do, they would leave them on the fields for several hours without any covering at all, while digging graves somewhere on the hill side for them. The stench round the commission house was something dreadful, and finally he had to have policemen patrolling round his house day and night to prevent people strewing corpses about in his immediate vicinity.
