This case is I believe, without a parallel in the criminal records of Ireland. Such speedy and complete retribution—so many trials for an agrarian murder in Munster. without a disagreement in the jury—so much public satisfaction with the results have not been known during the present century. What makes the matter more re-markable is that the juries were composed of Roman Catholies and Protestants, and that both the Attorney-General who prosecuted so successfully, and the Judges who presided so successfully, belong to the Ro man Catholic Church, to whose members many Roman Catholics formerly believed it would be in the highest degree dangerous to entrust the administration of justice.
