importance that the greatest be observed, and those who do not know to take care of themselves should be taken care of by the authorities, at least to the extent of preventing them from having opportunities to obtain articles unfit to be enten. The majority of purchasers of unripe fruit are children who are unable to understand the risk they run, and in consideration of the enormous quantities that they certainly do manage to consume, the only wonder is that the mortality list is not larger. An effort should, therefore, be made to prevent as far as possible the sale of unripe and decayed fruits which are no better than cholera bullets. The best regulations that can be framed will not red, and those who do not know egulations that can be framed will not however, keep people well if they refuse to take care of themselves, and the re-sponsibility for the sound sanitary condition of the community, must, in a very great measure, rest with individual their neighbors to do all in their power to prevent sickness.-Montreal
