After thinking the matter over carefully I came to the conclusion that this destruction was very probably cansed as follows:—The spring tides now being on, the young fish made their way up the brook, but when the tide receded, it left the bed of the brook bare for about one hundred yards from the bridge. The fish being cut off from reaching the river, had to confine themselves to a small hole under the bridge, and the day being exwind and surf piled them on shore, as above mentioned."
