NOTES OF TRAVEL:

And Reminiscences of a Pleasant Tour.

CHAPTER VIII.

SOME SPECIAL POINTS OF INTEREST.

The average reader or traveller is well aware of the places which attract the attention of visitors to large cities. These places are usually of historic interest, and have figured in some important celebration, or they commemorate the memory of the nation's leaders. Hence it was, that among the many monuments of New York, we were drawn towards that one known the world over, as "Grant's Tomb." The Tomb is a building of the architecture, and is erected upon one of the most prominent sites of the city. The building proper is surrounded by large columns, which look very imposing, and which add pleasing relief to the structure itself. The columns number forty-four, the purpose being, a column for each state within the union at the time of Grant's presidency. Our party entered the building as hundreds of thousands of others had done before, and for a few minutes we looked down into the great circular vault, where lies in solemn silence the casket of the brave man, and also that of the woman who bore life's struggles with him. Around and near by are to be seen the wreaths, and emblems of affection, which the world add at his feet. Flags, banners and mottoes, perpetrate the daring of the man, while richly engrossed addresses tell of the devotion of the people. Grant, no doubt, did his duty, and certain it is, that the people did not forget theirs at the right time, and at the right place.

America, and especially New York, can justly feel proud of the monument which stands to Grant's memory. It is worthy the man, and worthy the nation, and will long continue to be generations yet unborn will pay tribute to the spot. We were pleased to have seen this monument, and had expected to record our names as we had done at many other historic places, but in this we were disappointed, as there is not any register at the tomb. There is a sort of an office in one of the corners of the building, near the entry, but nothing at all like one would expect. We enquired of an elderly man who was there at the time of our visit, as to a register, but he did not know anything about it, nor did he think that there ever had been one kept. Perhaps a registry at such a place may not be desirable, and the nation in its wisdom decided against it; it cannot be that it was forgotten. But Grant's Tomb is such a splendid piece of architecture, and it stands so much by itself, and is so hygienic in every way, that it is very different from other similar monuments. It is more like a court-room than a tomb, and the beautiful approach and attractive surroundings, all harmonize with the purpose. Daily it has its visitors, some from afar, and some from nearer places. Crowned heads and humble peasants have in turn paid their respects to this shrine, and we think it would be a worthy perpetuation of their respect if their names were registered.

The many other objects of interest which are in view from this spot well repay the time of the tourist. They tell the tale of enterprise and independence, and reveal that dominant spirit which has made the U.S.A. the great Republic it is to-day. The busy crowds of people which meet the eye in every direction are a living proof of the alertness and push of the city itself. Such a scene is almost bewildering, but amid it all there still exists the rules of law and order; thus it is that every person finds and keeps their proper place. The view of the water-front of New York is immense, but the great bridges which span the river, are the wonder of all. We had seen pictures of these bridges, and had heard much about them, but to properly understand their magnitude or to appreciate their engineering skill, they should be visited and examined. Only by the best skill of the most expert engineers could such structures have been planned, and only by lavish expenditure could the work have been completed. All these requisites and qualifications were provided; and thus it is that these great bridges are to-day, among the best assets of the state; for they have been largely instrumental in developing the trade of the past half century. Neither New York, New Jersey, nor Brooklyn, ever could have become the great centres of industry which they are, were it not for the means of transit which these bridges afford; verily they are highways of traffic, and as the country advances their commercial value will advance also. It was our privilege to pass under and over these bridges, but from whatever position we beheld them, their strength and their design appealed to us, and drew forth our highest admiration, and we found ourselves saying more than once—"Well done New York."

The Men to Get After.

(From the Toronto Star.)

Special policemen are being sent out to see that motorists in Toronto do not exceed the speed limit. The problem of making life safe from motor accidents, however, involves much more than seeing that the speed limit is not exceeded. A car may at one time and place run just under the speed limit, and yet be more of a menace to life and property than another car which slightly exceeds the speed limit at another time and place.

The motorist who most needs attention is the one who, at any time or place, runs his car without proper regard for his surrounding circumstances, who shoots in, dodges across, takes chances, and imposes upon other motorists, drivers and pedestrians the whole responsibility of seeing that his heedlessness does not cause accidents. There are too many of these motorists who push along and expect others to "look out" if they don't want to get bumped. These drivers who force other people to take all the precautions are the ones who need to be disciplined, for sooner or later they cause tragedies.

An Offensive Hat.

A story, the point of which will appeal to many theatre-goers, is told by Mr. J. Cousins Lawrence in his "Revelations of Monte Carlo Roulette."

A very irascible elderly gentleman (writes the author) was playing at a certain table, and seated immediately in front of him was a lady wearing a somewhat large hat, surmounted by a really enormous plume that swung in all directions at every movement of the wearer.

He did his best to avoid it, dodging first one side then the other, only to meet the pendulous plume flopping against his face, until, exasperated, he seized the offending hat with both hands, and shook it backwards and forwards as well as the lady's head to which it was firmly attached, the plume, meanwhile, making vast plunges.

Of course, he immediately apologized, the lady being in tears at the indignity to which she had been subjected.

However, he was promptly pounced upon by the inspectors, walked off to the private sanctum, his carte confiscated, and the Casino knew him no more, for he was very properly expelled.
