Often, when near her, Vaughan used

Often, when near her, Vaughan used to watch her face, endeavoring to learn from its expression how she was affected towards himself; whether she cared for him, or whether she was only trying to make a tool of him.

But he could read nothing in her face—absolutely nothing; for neither her eyes nor her mouth betrayed the least feeling. She appeared to take all his attentions, all his adulation, as a matter of course; and she suffered her female companion to be present on nearly all occasions, thereby preventing Vaughan from ever making any positive declaration of love to her.

At length the tale of her betrothed husbano's inconstancy reacned the ears of Elizabeth Alland and her parents. Vaughan was rarely near the young ladynow; and when he did come she saw Vaughan was rarely near the young lady now, and when he did come she saw plainly that his manner was constrained and cold, and accordingly she waxed jealous; and her feelings grew bitter against her lover, and doubly so against the beautiful woman who had so led his wits astray.

Elizabeth made no accusation against him; she had not the courage to do so. She bore his heartless behavior with a quiet, sullen humor, which made him compare the cheerful temper of Juliana with that of his betrothed; much, of course, to the disadvantage of the latter. Sometimes Vaughan used to break out impatiently, and scenes between Elizabeth and himself became matters of constant occurrence. As time went on, Elizabeth's whole family showed their anger at Vaughan's faulty conduct, and at last they consulted their daughter on the subject of breaking off the proposed match. But the young lady would not listen to them, and tried to find excuses for her lover, firmly believing that she would soon be able to lure him back again to her side.

On the following day Vaughan called npon his future bride, who, contrary to her wont of late, received him with cheerful and kindly looks.

"I have not seen your brother for some time," she remarked, in the course of conversation.

"Ah, Deacon! He still lingers in town, conversation. "Ah, Deacon! He still lingers in town, though he is always protesting how uch he detests London." "It is a pity he remains still single," she went on. "Has he never thought of marriage?"

"Oh, yes," returned Vaughan. "Some years aga he was approved."

"Engaged!" echoed Elizabeth, with interest. "And his intended bride died, stammered Vaughan, in con-

"No?"
"No; the marriage was broken off."
"Broken off! Ah, then, I suppose she was unworthy of him?"
Vaughan flushed deeply.
"No, Elizabeth; nothing of the sort," he rejoined, in hurt syllables. "The lady was no other than the Countess Croitzskie!"

"The Countess Croitzskie!" repeated Elizabeth, in tones of disgust. "Is it possible? Well, I will not recall my words. She must have been faulty, or Deacon would never have—"

But before she could proceed further, Vaughan's hand gripped her shoulder somewhat rudely somewhat rudely.
"What do you know respecting her of whom you speak?" he demanded, passionately. The young girl shrank away from him in alarm, and began to weep.

"What do I know of her!" she cried out, vehemently. "I know that she is destroying my happiness and ruining you, Vaughan. Oh, dearest, fly from this woman ere she becomes our curse!"

"Our curse!" repeated he, starting up from his chair in a state of terrible excitement. "You know not what you say. Must I tell you that every glance she diement. "You know not what you say.

Must I tell you that every glance she casts upon me, every syllable she utters to me, is a benediction from above? Our curse! Heaven shower down such curses on me ever, I say!"

"Merciful powers!" ejaculated the girl, in terror. "Then—then you love her?"
He did not answer immediately; he could not do so, for he felt that his words would inflict great pain upon his listener. Presently he went on. "Yes, I love her," he said, with averted eyes. "Had I not made this confession to you, Elizabeth, I think my heart would have burst in twain. Pay attention to me, Elizabeth," he continued, "It was through me that she gave up Deacon's love."

"Through you?"

"Yes. Then I, struck by remose at heaving wronged my control of the continued."

having wronged my own good brother, forsook her. I thought that I should soon be able to forget her, and that she, forgetting me also, would restore to him which he had never really possessed—her affection. But she was wiser than I—oh, far wiser! She knew that our hearts are our masters, and that it is useless to struggle against their decrees. An abject feeling of duty caused me to act as I did—caused me to refuse the warm devotion she proffered me at that time and tion she proffered me at that time, and wrecked the lives of both for evermore."
"Wrecked your lives!" repeated Elizabeth, in dismay, "Oh, Vaughan, recall your words, I entreat! Do not say that your life is wrecked!" she added, sinking upon her knees before him, with raised hands and eyes.

upon her knees before him, with raised hands and eyes.
Elizabeth's wild, beseeching tones brought Vaughan for a moment back to his better self.

"My dear girl, pardon me!" he said, with some slight tenderness of manner, and at the same time raising her. "Pardon me, for we are not the controllers of our own destinies." "Go!" cried she, in bitter anguish, "go!" Leave me to myself!"

CHAPTER X. Next day the Countess Croitzskie's law-yer called at the house in Park lane on some particular business. When the ob-ject of his business was dispatched, the lady asked the lawyer what news was "Well, things are very flat at present," he answered. "The newest thing I have heard is that a serious misunderstanding has arisen between my old acquaintance. Vaughan Prynne, and the lady to whom he is engaged. The report current is that she has abruptly left London, and that all will end in a breaking up of the en-Oh, indeed!" ejaculated Juliana, calmly, every muscle of her face undisturbed.

"Well, people must talk about something.
For my part 1 do not believe the report.
Do you?"

The lawyer did not know how to reply. Her collectedness had completely astonished him. He had longed to be the first to retail this piece of scandal to her—this scandal, for which she, and she alone, was blameable; and, lo and behold! he had produced no effect—no effect whatever upon her! "Is her heart made of stone" he asked himself.

When her lawyer had withdrawn. Juliana nodded her head and laughed softly to herself. "Ah, how well I have learned to know these men! Am I surprised that Vaughan Prynne is once more in my net? No!"

Further on in the day Juliana placed herself at a window, whence she could herself at a window, whence she could command a view of the park. Vaughan had not been near her for a whole day, and she was beginning to grow somewhat uneasy at his unusual absence.

The lady looked down the street and up the street, and afterwards into the park, without discovering the object upon which she was so longing to rest her For a whole hour she gazed thus. At ength, wholly wearied, she rose to leave was doing, so, a murmur of discordant voices in the road beneath arrested her steeps, and brought her into the balcony overlooking the street. Here she perceived a perfect block of vehicles. There were brewers' drays, butchers' and greent grocers' cart, a wagon loaded with hay, another with household furniture, a carriage and pair, a dogcart, several cabs, an omnibus, a couple of wheelbarrows, and, lastly, a restive horse and its rider.

Juliana recognized the latter, who, notwithstanding the rearing of his steed, managed to raised his hat to her.

"Powers of mercy, he will be thrown!" she cried, as the animal raised himself almost erect on his hind legs, and snorted with terror. "He will never be able to keep his seat," she continued, as the horse made a sudden bound forward.

Juliana had spoken but too truly. Vaughan Prynne was jerked out of his saddle, and now lay on the ground in a quiet, helpless heap.

The lady shrieked out loudly, and without pushing rushed out of the balcony, out of the room and down the stairs, In the following instant she had wrenched open the outer door, and was standing in the street by the very side of the prostrate man, around whom there had her post of observation. But, just as she hor prostrate man, around whom there had her post of observation. But, just as she
