The Silent Barrier

(BY LOUIS TRACY.)

Bower's face had grown cold and gray while the old man was speaking. He began to understand. Stampa would spare him none of the horror of the tragedy from which he fied like a lost soul when the news of it reached the hotel. Well, he would not draw back now. If Stampa and he were destined to have a settleman while a color of reckoning—of alonement, he hoped—and ne would not shirk the ordeal, though his fiesh quivered and his humbled pride lashed him like a whip.

The squalid stable was peculiarly offensive. Owing to the gale, the cattle that ought to be pasturing in the high Alps ought to be pasturing in the high Alps ought to be pasturing in the high Alps ower crowded there in reeking filth. Yesterday, not long before this hour, he was terday, not long before this hour, he was humming verses of cow songs to Helen, and beguilling the way to the Forno with a recital of the customs and ldylls of the dead to drag him through the mire of the dead to drag him through the censed because of his daughter's untimely death, the situation would be more toterable. But his words were mild, and he words were mild and of whom he had no personal knowledge. This complete self-effacement grated—on Bower's nerves. It almost spoured him again to ungovernable rage. But he realized the paramount need of divination. He read Bower's heart. By self-control. He clenched his teeth in the effort to bear his punishment without protest.

And Stampa semed to have the gift of divination. He read Bower's heart. By some means he became aware that the unsavory shed was loathsome to the fine gentleman standing beside him.

"Etta was always so neat in her dress that it must have been a dreadful thing to see her laid there," he went on. "She donce at the top of old Corvatsch. She thought of me, I am sure, for she had my letter in her pocket telling her that I was at Pontresina with my voyageurs. And she would think of you, too—her lover, her promised husband.

Bower cleared his throat. He tried to frame a denial; but Stampa waved the unspoken thought aside.

"Surely you told her you would marry her, Herr Beron!" he said gently. "Was it not to implore you to keep your vow should not have been so brutal when she came to you in the hotel. Ah, well: It is all ended and done with now. It is said the Madona gives her most powerful aid to young girls who seek from her Son the mercy they were denied on earth. And my Etta has been dead sixteen long years—years enough for her sin to be clearned by the fires of Purgatory. Perhaps today, when justice is done to her at last, she may be admitted to Paradlse. Who can tell? I would ask the priest; but he would bid me not question the ways of Providence."

At last Bower found bis voice. "Etta is at peace." he muttered, "We have sufin my arms I should kiss her back to life again. I took the line of a bird. If I had crossed the Muretto, I should not be lame today; but I took Corvatsch in my path, and I fell, and when I saw Etta's grave the grass was growing on it. Come! The turf is sixteen years old now."

Breaking off thus abruptly, he swung away into the open pasture. Bower, heavy with wrath and care, strode close behind. He strove to keep his brain in-heavy with wrath and care, strode close behind. He strove to keep his brain intent on the one issue—to placate this sorrowing old man, to persuade him that silence was best. Soon they reached a path that curved upward among stunted trees. It ended at an iron gate in the centre of a low wall. Bower shuddered. This, then, was the cemetery. He had never noticed it, though in former years he could have drawn a map of the Maloja from memory, so familiar was he with every twist and turn of mountain, valley and lake. The sun was hot on that sfaali, plne-sheltered hillock. The snow was beginning to melt. It clogged their feet, and snow ceased falling.

Inside the wall the white covering lay leep. Bower's prominent eyes, searching deep. Bower's prominent eyes, searching deep. Bower's prominent eyes, searching everywhere with furtive horror, saw that a little space had been cleared in one corner. The piled-up snow was strewed with broken weeds and tufts of long grass. It bore an uncanny resemblance to the edges of a grave. He paused, irresolute, unnerved, yet desperately determined to fall in with Stampa's strange moved.

"There is nothing to fear," said the old man gently. "They brought her here. You are not afraid—you, who clasped her to your breast, and swore you loved her?" Bower's face, deathly pale before, flamed into sudden life. The strain was unbearable. He could feel his own heart beating violently. "What do you want me to do?" he almost shouted. "She is dead! My repentance is of no avail! Why are you torturing me in this manner?"

"Softly, son-in-law, softly! You are disturbed, or you would see the hand of Providence in our meeting. What could be better arranged? You have returned after all these years. It is not too late. Today you shall marry Etta!"

Bower's neck was purple above the line of his white collar. The veins stood out on his temples. He looked like one in the throes of apoplexy.

"For Heaven's sake! what do you mean?" he panted. "I mean just what I say. This is your wedding day. Your bride lies there, waiting. Never did woman wait for her man so still and patient." LETTERS OF A SLIM-MADE WO-

Fourth Letter: On the Housekeeping Burdens of the Overfat Woman. Dear Sis,—In solving the fat problem, I've also solved the servant problem so far as I'm concerned. My last maid of all work donned her hat and departed two weeks ago. And when I say "the last" I mean "never again." I'm doing my own work now and enjoying it, all because that terrible burden of flesh I carried has gone—never to return.

How plainly the mirror of memory reflects the past. I see myself as I was—a mountain of palpitating flesh, catering to servants whose lightest duties I could not perform because I could not carry the burden of my weight and of my household.

At last Bower found his voice. "Etta is at peace," he muttered, "We have suffered for our folly—both of us. I—I could not marry her. It was impossible."

Stampa did look at him then—such a look as the old Roman may have cast on the man who caused him to slay his loved daughter. Yet, when he spoke, his words were measured, almost reverent. "Not impossible, Marcus Bower. Nothing is impossible, Marcus Bower. Nothing is impossible, Marcus Bower. Nothing is impossible to God, and He ordained that you should marry my Etta."

"I tell you—" began Bower huskily; but the other silenced him with a gesture. As here to the impossible with a gesture. As here to the impossible of the providence of the hip bone, it is not known yet whether the trouble is due to defective ossification or whether it threatens to be tuberculosis. It is declared that nothing points to danger to the boy's life, and that the years of boyhood may bring better symptoms, but he has the extreme nervous activity often seen in children not destined to live long.

Any notion of thanksgiving as some fervent loyalists desired for his re-
