In the evening Lieut.-Col. Graham, D.S.O., of London, was present, as previously announced. The gloomy morning had cleared in the afternoon and the whole countryside turned out to join the citizens of the town in a capacity audience requiring many extra chairs. The Colonel handled his subject in a masterly fashion, speaking for one hour and twenty minutes and all were sorry when he had finished.

The music for the day was furnished by the united choirs of the Presbyterian and Methodist churches, under the able leadership of Mr. F. K. Matthews, and was of a very high class, proving an inspiration to congregations and speakers

Col. Graham's lecture on Monday evening on "The Battle of Amiens" was well patronized despite the heavy rain of the afternoon and evening and the unpassable condition of the roads. There has not been given in Watford and few have anywhere heard such a graphic account, such an adequate description and such an inspiring presentation of any part of the world's greatest war as that given by Col. Graham on Monday evening last. To have missed it was to miss a rare treat and a real education. The union choir again contributed two numbers and the anniversary services were bers and the anniversary services were brought to a close with the singing of the National Anthem.
