

cares of a professional career. And not only so, but in every university there should be established similar chairs, so that the relationship between man and his physical surroundings should form a part of the education of those who, in the nature of things, must be the future legislators of the land, who, if instructed in these relationships, would be ready to legislate wisely and intelligently instead of leaping in the dark. And who can tell the grand results, when the material condition of the race shall be advanced by enlightened sanitary knowledge and regulations; when the causes of disease are attacked in their stronghold; when national enjoyment shall supersede the discordant sounds of the revel; when the wants of the system shall be supplied with proper foods; when the physical state of man shall be elevated, and reacting upon his intellectual and moral powers, shall raise the race to the highest attainments possible.
