After marriage the same young man loves her perhaps even better, but he shows it in a more prosaic manner...

There is no doubt that a man can become more absorbed in business than anything else in the world.

To woman, love is the most important of all things, and business will always seem of secondary consideration.

Some girls find it very hard to realize that the business office is not a sort of school for love-making.

They should remember that their employer engages them to attend to his business, not to amuse his clerks.

The man who spends most of his time flirting with some pretty stenographer would not make a very reliable husband.

Courting hours come after business hours, and the man who can't get his mind off business long enough to do his love-making properly is not worth a dry fig.

But as for the young wife who never all day because her husband was lost in his newspaper at breakfast...

fast—we'll, she is simply looking for trouble. It does not mean that he loves her any less, but that the "race is to the swiftest," and if he is going to keep up with progress and earn a good living...

Buchanan's Wife

The Story of a Woman Who Dared to Meet in Herself the Love and Happiness That Were Debarred Her by Great Circumstances.

By Dumas Miles Journalist. Published by Permission of Harper & Bros., New York and London.

They spent a month there in company with Lord Strope and with Lord and Lady Logan—to give Isabella her proper but unfamiliar title. And then Beatrice Buchanan and Miss Trevor returned to the Engadine for August and a part of September.

But mid-autumn found the two, thanks to Lord Strope's and Isabella de Consigny's efforts, installed in a very beautiful flat in Paris, in the quiet rue de Luxembourg, which bore the westward side of the Luxembourg Gardens.

Still, the very waking, the quiet, peaceful life among congenial friends, the absence of anything dramatic or tragic, all these influences had their value as soothing Mrs. Buchanan's mind.

In August, Mrs. Buchanan and Allanor Trevor went to Lord Strope's Preston castle near Audlether, but mid-September brought them once more back to Paris and to the apartment in the rue de Luxembourg.

Just then, before they had fairly settled themselves, Beatrice had a letter from Harry Farling. He was in London, he said, just landed from Buenos Ayres. She had known that he was in South America, somewhere on the upper Orinoco with an exploring party, but this was all she knew.

She had been for a long time quiet and sheltered, distressed by pleasant occupation from too much brooding. And with her newly-acquired, calm strength, she had been successful in forcing out of her thoughts Harry Farling and what he meant to her.

But now, with his short, formally worded letter shaking in her hand, she felt a sudden overwhelming flood of emotion which amazed and frightened her. It was her first experience with the truth that a great thing may for a long time—even years—lie quite dormant in a man's or a woman's mind, subconscious as it were, and at last, thru some trivial accident, burst forth in all its old, tremendous strength.

Then she began to write letters to Farling. She wrote six, all very different and most of them absurd. Her maid told him to come and some begged him, as he loved her, to stay away. Towards evening she came down all up, and sent a servant out to the nearest bureau de poste with a telegram. It was a message of one word, and said: "Come."

He came by that night's train, reaching Paris at 5 in the morning, but it was not until afternoon, after the formal hour, that he presented himself.

Beatrice had rehearsed with elaboration and care just how she was to meet him and what she was to say, for she was still very much disturbed and a bit frightened by no means sure of herself. According to rehearsal she was to be exceedingly friendly—just that. She was to profess a great interest in what he had done during this past year, and she was to be voluble over her own wanderings.

By the time they had finished with these topics other callers were sure to have dropped in, and the situation would, from that point, take care of itself.
