There is, however, another standpoint from which to con-sider the work at the asylum, viz., the profit derived from the patients' work and the attention of the visitors was directed chiefly along this line. Following luncheon, the veteran superintendent, in a brief address welcomed the members, and said he had invited them to look into the conduct he asylum, especially of the farm and garden, for themselves, because the But he felt that the methods adopted were not understood by the general public and the legislature, or such dropped. The milk for the institution was of the finest quality, yet cost only 1.29 cents a quart. He referred to the cess of the piggery, and said $1,500 had been cleared from it, which amount was not included in the profit of farm. The pigs were fed almost exclusively with the waste from the dining-tables and kitchen. The ice pond built last vear effected considerable saving. In pre-

The speaker believed the time had come when the asylum should have more land. Proof had been furnished that the men connected with the asylum knew what to do with it. He considered the farmers and gardeners there were as hardworking, as painstaking, and as intelligent as any in Western

In closing, Dr. Bucke said he wished to impress the absolute necessity of having an infirmary at the asylum. The system of treatment inaugurated for the relief of the unfortunates, and which had proved itself so unqualified a success, entailed a vast amount of surgical work, for the performance of which an infirmary was necessary. As a result of the adoption of that system they were every year sending peo-ple home to their friends, cured, who otherwise would never have left the asylum. All they had now in the way of an infirmary was two little rooms up three pairs of stairs. "But," he added "irrespective of these new conditions which have presented themselves in connection with the London Asylum, every large institution of this nature should have an infirmary."
