

Then is the hour to seek the sylvan bank
Of lonely stream, remote from human haunt;
To mark the wild bee voyaging, deep toned,
Low weighing down each floweret's tender stalk;
To list the grasshopper's hoarse creaking chirp;
And then to let excursive fancy fly

that he was watched, he set about disposing of the body of his victim. He tied the hands and feet, and attaching a rope to the neck, he lowered the body out of the window into a back yard. He then went round to this yard, and taking hold of the rope, dragged the body after him to a rising ground, called La Roche. The head, as it bounded over the stones, for the ground was uneven and rocky, left behind portions of hair and flesh, which were collected the next day, and brought forward as proofs of the horrid deed. He had, previous to lowering the body, stripped it, and left the clothes behind, with the exception of a neckerchief, which he brought with him for a purpose we shall see by and by. On reaching the spot called La Roche, it appears the thought first struck him of cutting the body in pieces (for he had made no previous preparations for this dreadful operation) and he then attempted to do it with a small pocket knife, but in endeavour,
