Investment News

Halifax, May 23, 1913.

An Analysis Of BRANDRAM- HENDERSON B-O-N-D-S

Security of Principal.
Total bond issue is $450,000
amply secured by first mortgage on the Company's assets.

Stability of Income.
Gross profit for 1912 was $1,000,000, but the net profit was $1,000,000, which was sufficient to pay the bond interest four times over.

Percentage to Yield.
At the present price of 97 1/2 p. c. and interest and investment in these bonds now gives the high yield of 6 1/2 p. c.

Convenience of Denomination.
The large investor will prefer the $1,000 denomination, but the man with but a few hundred dollars to invest will find the $100 issue most convenient.

Altogether a very good bond to buy. Are you desirous of more details?

other. She drew others into the vortex. She organized the giggling waiters upon the floor. By hissing and shouting and the flutter of newspapers they drove the enemy before them, and a carpenter was called in to mend screen doors and windows, thus preventing their return. New shades were hung to darken the room and new tablecloths purchased to replace the old ones, and the whole place had such a cleaning as it had not known before in five years.

In this work the time passed swiftly, and when Redfield and Cavanagh came again to lunch they exclaimed in astonishment, as if indeed, every one did, "How's this?" queried Cavanagh humorously. "Has the place changed hands?"

Like was but grimly responsive. "Seems like it has."

"I hope the price has not gone up."

"Not yet."

Redfield asked, "Who's responsible for this new day?"

"You've hit it. She's started right in to polish us all up to city standards. She can run the whole place out of it."

"I don't see how she can do it. The work she got out of them girls is a wonder."

Lee Virginia came in flushed and self-conscious, but far from spiritless. She sat at breakfast, and stood beside the table while the waitress laid the dishes before her guests with elaborate assumption of grace and design. Hitherto she had bumped them down with a slash of blimp comment. The change was quite as wonderful as the absence of the old waitress.

"Do we owe these happy reforms to you?" asked Cavanagh, admiring Virginia's dash and glowing dress.

"Partly," she answered. "I was desperate. I had to do something, so I took to ordering people around."

"I understand," he said. "Won't you sit at our table again?"

"Please do," said Redfield. "I want to talk with you."

She took a seat a little hesitatingly. "You see, I studied domestic science at school, and I've never had a chance to apply it here."

"Here's your opportunity," Redfield assured her. "My respect for the science of domestic science is growing. I want to think what another week will bring forth. I think I'll have to come down again just to observe the improvement in the place."

"It can't last," Lee interjected. "She'll catch the western habit. She'll say, 'I'm a girl, and I'll make a free hand of it.'"

"No, she won't," declared Redfield, with intent to encourage her. "If you give her a free hand I predict she'll make a wonderful success of it."

"When do you go back to the mountains?" Lee Virginia asked a little later.

"Immediately after my luncheon," he replied.

She experienced a pang of regret and could not help showing it a little. "Your talk helped me," she said. "I've decided to stay and be of use to my country."

Redfield overheard this and turned toward her.

"Mrs. Redfield to know you. I'm sure her advice will be helpful. I hope you'll come up and see us if you decide to settle in Halifax or if you don't."

"I should like to do so," she said, touched by the tone as well as by the words of the invitation.

"Redfield's house is one of the few completely civilized homes in the state," put in Cavanagh. "When I get so weary of city ways and poaching and graft that I can't live without killing some one I go down to Elk Lake and make a few days' vacation."

"And you mean to stay here?" asked Redfield.

"I don't know," she said. "When I get weak-kneed or careless in the service and feel my respect slipping away I go up to Redfield's cabin and talk with him. He's a real man, and he's not a bit of a hypocrite."

Redfield laughed. "There! Having landed each other reciprocal bouquets, we can now tell Miss Wetherford the truth. Each of us thinks very well of himself, and we're both believers in the new west."

"What do you mean by the new west?" asked Redfield.

"Well, the work you've been doing here this morning is part of it," answered Redfield. "It's a kind of house-cleaning. The old west was picture-book and in a way many and fine-certain phases of it were heroic and noble to look at, but it was not all poetry. The plain truth is my companions for over twenty years were lawless ruffians, and the cattle business as we practiced it in those days was founded on selfishness and defended at the mouth of the pistol. We were all pensioners on Uncle Sam's fighting to keep the other fellow out from having a share of his bounty. It was all wasteful, half savage. We didn't want settlement; we didn't want law; we didn't want a state. We wanted free range. We were a line of plagues from beginning to end, and we're not wholly reformed yet."

Some one at the table accused Redfield of being more of a town state lawbreaker than a cattleman.

"He was quite unmoved by this charge," the townstate boomer at least believed in progress. He does not go so far as to insist on settlement. I don't care to have my children live the life I've lived. Besides, what right have we to stand in the way of a community's growth? Suppose the new life is less picturesque than the old. We don't like to leave behind us the pleasures and sports of boyhood, but we grow up nevertheless. I'm far more loyal to the state as a forest supervisor than I was when I was riding with the cattlemen to scare up the nesters."

At this moment Sam Gregg entered
