MARATHON RACE.

Thrilling Story of the Loss of the Schooner Annie E. Bliss and the Rescue of Her Grew After Sixty Two Hours in an Open Boat.

A few hours after the discovery of the wreck the life-savers still were awaiting an opportunity to get their boats through the surf. Meanwhile a life preserver bearing the name "Fidington, Boston," drifted ashore, evidently cast overboard by one of the sailors either to carry the name of the stranded vessel to the watchers on the beach or to show the drift of the current. Soon afterwards one of the sailors launched a raft from the vessel apparently for the intention of bringing a line ashore, but the current carried him further from the shore and away to the westward, exposed to seas which swept the raft. The vessel seemed to be resting in the sand and in no immediate danger of breaking up. The masts still were standing, but the crew were unwilling to trust themselves afloat.

in. The vessel labored so hard with her heavy cargo that great seams were opened up in her side, through which the water poured in immense volumes. The cargo being of wood the vessel floated, but she became thoroughly waterlogged and rolled and wallowed in the seas which raked her fore and aft. The crew had the greatest difficulty from being washed overboard.

The pumps were manned, all hands taking turns for five hours continuously until the valves became choked and refused to work. The vessel then became continually unmanageable and a dead weight in the sea, deprived of all buoyancy and resistance to the waves. At 4 o'clock Wednesday morning a huge wave took the craft fair under the starboard side and toppled her over on her beam ends. The crew had barely time to throw out the ship's boat, which was some 25 feet long, and jump over the stern into the craft, although several had narrow escapes.
