A Romance of the Canadan Northlands, by Temple Hall

Forrance Grant's spendid northern hone and placed somewhere in the sauna few hundred yards from the door. A week of rain had swollen it to its highest mark and the rushing water could be plainly heard. A young man, of perhaps twentyfive, tanned by the northern climate, at on the verandah, where he was joined by Torrence Grant's daughter, a splendid type of the athletic Canadian girl. "Miss Dot Grant?" "Well, sir?"

"Will you marry me?"

"No, I won't!" "Very well, then, don't; that's all!" Mr. Ridley Thorburn drew away his chair, and putting his feet on the rail, unfolded his newspaper. Miss Dot Grant went on with her sewing. She wondered if Dot was silent. She was thinking, no that was going to be all he would say. She of the accident, but her appearance when had felt this proposal coming for weeks, she was lying asleep on the grass.
but the scene she had anticipated was not "How long were you there but the scene she had anticipated was not like this one. She had thought to refuse him; but it was to be accomplished grace

"As long as you were. I was up in the most eager pleadings. She was to have told him that though respecting his manly worth and high character, she could never be more than an appreciative and warm friend. She had intended to shed a few But instead he had asked her the simple question, and, on bying answered, had

"By George she is handsome when in a rage," thought Ridley to himself after the was gone, as he slowly folded up his newshave her," he said aloud, "as sure as my

A different man was Thorburn of the A different man was Thorburn of the present, pacing up and down the path leading to the little landing-place to that of a few moments ago receiving his refusal from the woman he loved. For he loved Dottie Grant with all his heart. The real difficulty in the way, as he half suspected, was not so much with himse f, as with his limited bank account. Dot Grant had an insuperable objection to an empty wallet. The daughter of a Canadian umber king, she daughter of a Canadian umber king, she had been denied nothing. Their summer home on the Magnetawan was one of luxury. From her girlhood days in Toronto, she had had pin money enough in a week to pay Ridley's whole bills for a month. She had no idea of changing her place for one of less comfort and independence; and, be sless to thia, it had been told her that a mistably in gentleman of old English arisneighboring gentleman of old English aris-tocratic lineage, looked upon her with covetous eyes. Certainly he was wrinkled, old ent mercenary state of mind Miss Dortie Grant did not desire such a chance of be-

Meantime Ridley had continued don the path to the river. The Magnet alled was high after the fall rains and near their its banks. The rushing waters Georgian stray logs, flowed swiftly on to Georgian Bay Now, it happened obved to look at curious coincidence, also rolved to look at the river. She dried er tears and putting on her hat, slipy dout the back door, ting on her hat, slipy dout the back door, to avoid meeting addley, soon found herself to avoid meeting addley to avoid mee bank overlooking the river. Throwing herself at the roots she was soon lulled into a day dream by the babbling of the rapid flood beneath. To one who knew the action of the swift rivers of the northern reigions of Canada, this would have been the last resting-place they would have sought; indeed, to Dot it almost proved to be, in indeed, to Dot it almost proved to Away deep down in Dot's heart was a feeling very much like remorse. The was not sure but that she would be sorry, and that after all there were worse situations than Ridley Thorburn's wife.

"But, oh," she cried, flushing with the thought, "he was so rude, so insulting, could never live with him. Never!"

Meantime Ridley had continued don the path to the river. The Magaet alled the side of the side of the side of the path to the river. The Magaet alled the side of the s you?"

"Happy to do it again any day," said he hardly knowing what to reply.

"I wish to thank you so much."

"Quite welcome, Dot, I'm sure."

There was another long silence, brokenouly by the rustle of the wind through the tamarack trees.

"Ridley?"
