s commonly thought that the stock of Cotton in Britain must be greatly reduced. This is, we believe, a mistake. It is larger at present than usual. The following particulars, which we copy from an exchange paper, explains the cause of this com parative abundance :-

"The Cotton supply in England is larger than it ever was before at this season of the year. This comes from the stopping of many mills, the running of others on short time, and the large importation from India. The trouble there is not so much in quantity as quality. The India cotton is abundant, having increased in the year eighty five per cent, in the last six months one hun dred and sixty per cent. The total receipts from India are 1,350,000 bales. England can therefore rely upon at least two million bales for another year, adding to this what she can obtain from Egypt, Brazil, and other parts. But the American cotton which is the best quality, is now two hundred thousand bales short, and is wholly cut off for the next year.'
