HUBERT CORNELL IN A QUIANT WORLD

Dines on Buttermilk Gruel and Black Bread in Peasant's Home

Sergeant Hubert Cornell, in a recent letter to his mother, Mrs. H. E. Cornell, tells of the quaint land of France, where he is billeted at present in a peasant's cottage. In a letter dated Sept. 27th, he spoke of picking luscious blackberries in full view of the German trenches and under shell fire.

France, Oct. 1 1916

Dear Mother—Another month begun and the war still goes on. It hardly looks like October, as all the trees are perfectly green. The English walnuts are ripe and you see wonderful bunches of grapes in the shop windows. On the brow of every hill there is a Dutch windmill. You would hardly know there was a war over here on some of these sunny Autumn mornings. Under the present circumstances you might consider the wooden shod peasants and their surroundings scenery as beautiful and foreign. But having more or less of an artistic taste I suppose I prefer things more in the abstract than the concrete. However, it will be a great memory in years to come whether I really enjoy it now or not. Last night in the peasant's cottage where I am billeted at present I had some of their "hot pop" as they called it. It was hot buttermilk gruel which I ate with a wooden spoon. They seemed to take it as an honour so I did it again tonight. This being Sunday, it was made a little different with more sugar. I also had black bread with it. Everything they have here must be of some use. They certainly think more of utility than of the esthetic side of things. The dog runs the tin, but all cats are wild in this country. The girl is the bird man. I got the raspberry buns all right. The tin was pretty well jammed but I got it. By jove, mother, they were good to. I don't suppose I would fancy such pastry at home but out here I certainly appreciate it.

I have been at the place where Delos Spence met his death.

Yours truly,
Hubert
