LOVE AND HONOUR.

A. TALE OF THE CLYDE.
CHAPTER XXXI.

EVIS NEWS FROM SCOTAND—EDWIN AND ETITCHE IN THE PROFITESS.
His first feeling was that of perplexed astionishment. He assumed his mether's conjecture to be correct—that Eridgemorth had departed for Australia and taken fleien with him—and felt annoyed that he should have followed this singular course when the matter of the forgery had been satisfactorily cleared up. Then the thought of how seriously the news would affect Hermann rushed upon him, and he was grieved to the heart.

"This is cruel of my uncle," he said to himself. "To go at all and carry Helen with him was bad enough, but to do it in such a skulking way is positively barbarous. Poor Hermann, how will he bear it?
how can I ever tell him? It will make him reckless and desperate, knowing that she is now lost to him for ever."

Ritchie entered at the moment, and was at once stunned with the evil news.

"Gane, Maister Edwin?" he gasped.

"Helen and her father baith gane?"

"Gone and left no trace behind them.
It is monstrous now that—. Why,
Ritchie, you are pale as death, and you tremble like a leaf. Here, drink up this flaggon of Voisey's best wine."

But Ritchie only sauk into a chair, and groaned in agony.

"Oh, Maister Edwin," he wailed, "this

But Ritchie only sank into a chair, and groaned in agony.

"Oh, Maister Edwin," he wailed, "this is worst o' a'. Oh, what for did we baith leave them?"

"Wherefore did they take their departure in such strange fushion?" rejoined Edwin, a little impatiently. "Helen is to blaum as well as her father. It was a selfish thing for him to do, but I count it hearfless of her, knowing, as she could not but know, how Hermann and young to speak of my nother and myself would feel. She has really behaved very lad."

"Whicht, siv—oh whisht. Dinna speak that way, Maister Edwin, interrupted Ritchie. "This is the dacin' o' Dubosque and the humplage."

"Whet?" shouted Edwin, with a great start.

"Yos," continued Ritchie, "I am shure o't. They has carried them off. Oh, any puir lassie, ye're in the o' that damned villain."

"Yos," continued Ritchie, "I am shure o't. They has carried them off. Oh, any puir lassie, ye're in the o' that damned villain."

puir lassie, ye're in the o' that unimer villain."

"Good heaven! I never thought of such a thing as that," eried Edwin, in anch agitation. "Carried of! Oh, that cannot see. Bad as these men are, they would not dare."

"Men like them wull dang onything and stick at mething," sail littede, "Ye mind hop the devilish and this shapen wretch swore tae be revenged, and this is is the plan he has fa'en on; and the pair, pair lassie lost—lost for ever; madeby tae leep her—mebody tae save her."

"I will follow him to the ends of the earth," exclaimed Edwin with blazing eyes.

eyes.
"Follow whaur ye like, the evil is dune," grouned Ritchie; "and God only knows what my puir darling has suffered.

I L could ""

"Follow what my puir durling has suffered.
1—1—could—"
Here sobs checked his utterance, and he lowed his head on his knee and gave way, to the most violent emotion.
Edwin was little less moved. He tried to cherish the hope himself, and to inspire it into the heart of Ritchie, that Mrs. Allerton's supposition rather than his, was the truth—that Bridgenorth and Helen had gone away to Australia—but every moment given to redection served to make this more and more unlikely. Dridgenorth had given no hint of such an intention, and there was no reason why he should have taken such a course. On the contrary, everything that had transpired since his return combined to present strong inducement for him to remain in England. His friends had welesmed him, he had found a daughter who loved him and who was worthy of his love, and the stain which had rested so long on his name and character was removed—why, then, should he depart in such a sudden and clandestine manner?

No; the horrible and dismaying idea that Victor Dabos me and Jasper Jaquini had school the was more likely to be the truth, and if this were so, the result was sufficient to justify Ritchie's worst apprehensions. From the vindictiveness of the humehback and the revengeful and unserroulous passion of the Frenchman, Bridgenorth and Helm had everything to feat.

What could be done?

This question was given nuturance to by Victor Ria.

What could be done? What could be done?

This question was given utterance to by both again and again, but no practical answer suggested itself. Situated as they both were, they were unable to act in any way, But one thing they mutually resolved on, and that was that they would not acquaint. Hermann with the crushing tidings which had come. The blow they well knew would be prestrating when it fell upon him, and he kneeded all his courage and strength of heart in the fearful work he was called on to do.
