I mean. She must be the girl who Lady Linton wrote about."

"I imagine so. She answers the description that Miriam gave of her photograph. Yes, hark I she has just opened her door, and surely that was a baby's cry."

"Well, at last we have seen her, "returned the girl, "and I must confess, I think she is perfectly lovely. She has such beautiful cyes, such a fair, delicate complexion, and is so peculiarly dainty every way. I do not blame Sir William for falling in love with her."

"Mercy, Sadie, how you do chatter! no one would believe, to hear you, that you had been almost heart-broken because this girl, over whom you are so enthusiastic; had ruined your prospects," returned her mother impatiently.

The young girl flushed crimson at this shaft.

The young girl flushed crimson at this in the young girl flushed crimson at this shaft.

"Thank you, mamma, for reminding one of the fact." she said, bitterly. "It is true that through her all my fondest hopes have been blighted, and I suppose I ought to bitterly late her for it; but truly her exceeding beauty and a sectness half disarms me."

The elder woman made no reply to this, let the remanner betrayed both contempt and irritation, her brow was clouded with a wrathfulexpression, and her lips were drawn into a straight, rigid line, denoting some cruel and inflexible purpose.

It will readily be su mired that these two ladies were none other than Mrs. Farnum and her daughter, who, as we learned in the previous chapter, who traveling in the United States, in the ope of improving the health and spirits of all latter.

Mrs. Farnum had married while very young, and was the mother of three children—two sons and one daughter.

She had herself been very attractive as a girl, and had many suitors; but with an eye to the comforts of life, she had caid "no" to all the titled and impecunious lovers, and given her hand to a man of wealth, who, with his millions of pounds, bade fair to add another million to them in the course of time.

given her hand to a man of wealth, who, with his millions of pounds, bade fair to add another million to them in the course of time.

Miriam Heath, on the contrary, had been rather a plain looking girl, somewhat cold and repelling in manner, and was almostan old maid before she was married; thus she was often an inmate of her friend's palatial home, and became much interested in her children, and little Sadie Farnum had scarcely reached her teens before the two women began to plan a union between the young heir of Heathdale and the heiress to half a million pounds.

It had been the cherished dream of years, while almost from childhood Sadie Farnum had been foolishly taught to regard Heathdale as her future home, and to look upon Sir William as her promised husband; thus the disappointment had been a terrible one to them all when they learned that the baronet had married a "nobedy" from the hated and disloyal country that had rebelled against its rightful sovereign.

Lady Linton might be said to have become almost a maniac upon this point, and so bitter was her ire at thus being banked in her plans, so keen her harted of the innecent girl who had been the cause of it, that she abandoned herself to the wildest schemes, casting all honor and womanliness to the winds, and bending all her energies to have the winds, and bending all her energies to the winds and bending all her energies to the winds, and bending all her energies to the winds and bending all her energies to the winds, and bending all her energies to the winds. opportunity to strike a fatal blow to her hampiness.

Virgie had of late experienced a good deal of anxiety regarding her nusband, for his letters, which at first had come with every steamer, had suddenly ceased entirely.

For a while this had only filled her with hope, for she had told herself that doubtless he was coming for her; he might even be on the way to give her a joyful surprise. But as time went on and not a word came from him she was haunted with a sickening dread. He might be ill, she reasoned; but surely in that case he would send some message by another, or, if he could not do that, some member of his family would certainly let her know.

She wrote faithfully, notwithstanding, giving all details regarding hersof and their little one, never dreaming that her fond letters, having first been devoured by evil, greedy eyes, were ruthlessly consigned to the flames.

she noticed the young lady admiring her baby.

Miss Farnum colored slightly, then said beldly, with a light laugh:

'Pray do not think me very bold, Mrs. Heath, but I have been seeking an introduction to your little daughter. She is very lovely, and I am so fond of babies."

While she spoke her eyes had been fixed upon Virgic's face, and she thought she had never looked upon anyone more beautiful than this woman who was her rival—for so she regarded her.

She wore a delicate blue lawn, trimmed profusely with filmy white lace; there was a few blush-roses fastened in her belt. Every day she was growing stronger and better, and her beauty seemed to increase in proportion.

A Prominent Doctor Accused o Murder
A gentleman recently made a startling accusation in the hearing of the writer. Saidher "I firmly believe that Dr. intentionally believe that Dr. intentionally or unintentionally killed my wife. He pronounced her complaint—Consumption—incurable. She accepted the verdict, and—died. Yet since then I have heard of at least a dezen cases, quite as far advanced as hers, that have been cured by Dr. Pierce's Goiden Medical Discovery. Her life might ave been saved, for Consumption is not incurable." Of course it is not. The "Discovery" will remove every trace of it, if taken in time and used faithfully.
