Vera's Love Affair

"She imagines-oh, of course, it is all a mistake-but she has somehow got it into her head that you are here toto-watch her, to-to-" Here poor Griselda flounders hopelessly and grows as red as any rose with shame and fear. "She thinks," desperately, "that your father sent you here to see whom she speaks to and to report to him all

The murder is out, and a sudden feeble desire for something to sit down on takes possession of Griselda. "Is this the truth?" demands Dysart, in what to the frightened Griselda sounds an awful voice.

"Yes-yes," stammers she; "but I tell her it is all a mistake. It is most foolish of her, but—speak to her, Seaton," in an agony, "and assure her you would not act such a traitor's part to-
