THE GRASSHOPPERS.

A good deal has been said about the ravages of this insect, and its destructive properties are greatly exaggerated. There is no doubt at all that as the country settles up, these pests, and they come only at rare intervals, can be reduced to a minimum. As more land is brought under cultivation their damage will be comparatively light, and experience will no doubt suggest many ways of disarming them of their power to commit much harm. They can hardly be taken into consideration when there is anything like comparative settlement.
