NEW STORIES OF VICTORIA ARE PUBLISHED

Correspondence of One Of Queen's Ladies-in-Waiting Is Volume of Interest

ROYAL HOUSEHOLD AMUSEMENTS

Elevated Tone Introduced By Prince Consort at Dinner Table—The Duke of Cambridge at Prayers—Queen Victoria a "Womanly Woman"

(London Daily News.) Much interesting matter about the home life of Queen Victoria in the early years of her reign is contained in the "Correspondence of Sarah Spencer Lady Lytton, 1787-1870" (Murray, 12s. net), which has been edited by the Hon. Mrs. Hugh Wyndham, and is published today. Lady Lytton, the daughter of the second Earl Spencer, became lady-in-waiting to Queen Victoria in 1838, and four years later was appointed governess to the royal children, by whom she was affectionately known as "Liddle."

In one of the letters we see the Queen as a young woman who was particularly about the pronunciation of words (which differed in many respects from our pronunciation today), and anxious to be regarded as an authority on such matters. Writing from Buckingham Palace in February, 1839, Lady Lytton says: "The queen says gold open, not gold; also Rome open, not Rome; also Prussia in my way (she was accustomed in childhood to the other way), rhyming to Russia, in spite of the heart of Chester. She is particularly pleased at being reckoned an authority about accent, and takes great pains about it."

Card Losses "Honesty" Paid There are, of course, descriptions of the queen's profligate of parliament, of her wedding, and such great matters. But it is for its account of the queen's private life, the life of the queen that these letters are most valuable. Here, for example, is a realistic note on the amusements of the royal household at Windsor in 1841: "Played at cards last night. It is now for money, and I was very much amused. The queen paid very honestly. A round game was played lately, after which Miss Paget had to pay Prince Albert five guineas, which she did, first washing them with yellow soap for his royal hands. Here again, is a vivid picture of the queen as a young mother:

"The princess hid her head under the nurse's arm yesterday, and on the queen peeping round to see why she did it, H. R. H. was detected in that act, and she was told to be good. The queen said: 'Oh, my naughty, naughty' upon which the child looked shyly at her, and held up her mouth to be kissed. It is lucky another is coming. The queen is, like all very young mothers, and I think, never thinks of the baby making progress enough or is good enough. She has her constant. A little later we find Lady Lytton commenting on the rather elevated tone which the Prince Consort introduced at the dinner table: "We have, I begin to notice, rather a great deal of conversation, and of course, scientific subjects come up, and are talked of very much. The queen is very much interested in the subject, and encourages me to talk. The prince, of course, encourages me to talk. No matter how things are said daily which I am sorry to forget. The prince and queen are reading Hallam's 'Constitutional History of England' together, most carefully, and for a light book 'St. Simon's Memoirs' are very pleasant to find him reading long to her, while she was at cross-stitch, as I did the other evening before dressing-time. Oh! what a blessed it is that 'Love rules the world' as he does!

Prince of Wales' Baby Carriage

In 1844 we see the Prince of Wales hard put to it to keep up his courage during the firing of a review. "I was deeply interested in Prince, who sat on my lap and looked so prettily. It was quite near. I afraid Soldiers got popping! No matter! I have the most constant and bursting heart; but he conquered himself completely, did not cry a drop, and quite calm to be a review."

It is an entertaining description of how the Duke of Wellington embarrassed the queen one evening by discussing cabinet secrets at the top of his voice at the dinner table:

Last evening was amusing enough, thanks to the Duke of Wellington, who made a great joke by beginning to talk as loud as thunder to the queen, by whom he sat, about a matter of such serious and critical and difficult state importance, that it ought only to have been alluded to in cabinet. He was evidently quite unaware how loud he talked. The queen blushed over and over, and at last succeeded in screaming out upon some other subject. But he went on: "Yes, Madam. That is what I am driving at now. Whether I shall carry my point I am not sure. Lord John, says it—etc., etc."

Prince Albert cuts in to keep himself warm one winter day in Windsor Castle: "We have been struggling through the coldest day in this winter, so far every body, from the tailor to Prince Albert, has come in with red nose and tingling fingers. Such a hurricane of northeast wind, such dark clouds, absent sun, and had obduracy of black frost I never saw. I said to the prince: 'Will Your Royal Highness consent to look over the quarterly accounts which I have just brought down?' H. R. H. 'Yes, certainly, if you will consent to my doing red steps all the time to warm myself.' (H. R. H. was actively so doing as he spoke.) S. L.: 'By all means, sir, provided your Royal Highness does not insist on my joining.' So we were sportive."

The Duke of Cambridge at Prayers

Very amusing, again, is the account of the eccentric habits of the Duke of Cambridge in his later days, as we see in a letter from Osborne in 1880: "I am again going to help to work off the old Duke of Cambridge, who is said to be somewhat troublesome, by asking, in his good father's tone, such questions as, 'How do you get on here?' 'Rather dull, hey?' within two hours of the dinner at a small table."

Little Beauty Chats

By BLANCHIE BEAON

Make Your Hair Shine

It is a distinct art to make the hair shine, and yet it must shine this year, or you will be behind the times. No matter how you object to this additional beauty task being placed upon your shoulders, you will have to succumb to the demands of fashion in the end. If your hair is naturally dull, then I pity you, as this means loads of work for unfortunate you.

If you desire tresses that glow softly at the world, let me give you a hint. Wash your hair frequently as this will do much your silken hair strands and that the sun's rays should be allowed to play merrily upon your head for a brief half hour or so. If you disregard this advice, it will be useless for you to yearn for glossy hair.

There are two things that Milled must not do if the sepiore to polished tresses. What are they? Be patient and I will tell you.

First, let me say that one's glory crown must not be dried in the evening, as this toward making it shine, although, when one comes down to details, it isn't so much the washing as it is the rinsing that gives a gloss to one's tresses. It is the easiest thing in the world to wash the hair, but it is quite a difficult matter to free it from the solid water and soap-suds. You must even make up your mind to rise, and rise, and rise, until there isn't a particle of soap suds left in your hair. This is one way of coaxing a pretty glow into existence.

Another way is to always dry your hair in the sun. It is imperative that the air should have free play through tends to make it dull and heavy, in a word, everything it should not be. Second, do not wash it on a damp day, else you will be unable to dry it thoroughly, and damp hair is always murky. This fall there is a new French recipe out for making the hair shine. It is an oil, which, when applied to the hair by means of a perfectly clean brush, imparts to it a brilliant finish. The magic oil which gives this delightful result is easily obtained at most drug stores. Under what name does it masquerade? Why, jamine, of course. This oil is easily sweet but delicious if you are not too leary with it.

MISSIONARY'S HARD EXPERIENCE

Rev. Percy Broughton, Anglican missionary to the Esquimaux in Baffin land, arrived in Sydney, N. C., on Saturday on his return to England. He is suffering from the terrible results of exposure to the cold which necessitated several operations to his feet. In March, while returning to his station, he lost his way and sent for his guide and had to spend two nights in the open. With both feet frozen he finally crawled to an Esquimaux village and sent for help. He was taken back to his station, where his cook attempted to amputate his toes. Later the mission ship arrived and took him off transferring him to the government steamer Minto, the doctor on which performed more operations and finally transferred him to the Beethlie. He will return to the north in a couple of years.
