I wished to see how the schooner lay and what change had befallen the ice in the night, and went on deck. It was blowing a whole gale of wind from the north-west. The schooner lay with a list of about fifteen degrees and her bows high cocked. I looked over the stern and saw that the ice had sunk there, and that there were twenty great reats and yawning seams where I had before noticed but one. A vast block of ice had falles on the starboard side, and lay so close on the quarter that I could have sprung on to it. No other marked changes were observable, but there were a hundred sounds to assure me that peither the sea nor the gale this crystal territory, and that if 1 thought proper to climb the slope and expose myself to the wind, I should be-hold a face of ice somewhat different from what I had before gazed upon. I stepped into the cabin, and, going to the cook-room, found Tassard still heavily sleeping. The coal in the corner was low, and as it wanted an hour of dinner-time I took the lantern and abustes and went into the forepeak, and after several journeys stocked up a good provision of coal in the corner. I made noise enough, but Tassard slept on. The going into the forepeak had put my mind upon the treasure, which as I had gathered from the Frenchman's memory is good"—he counted afresh and such counted afresh and gathered from the Frenchman's memory is good"—he counted afresh and into the cabin, and, going to in ingots; one cheat of gold ingots; one cheat of hears of which cheat of hears of which cheat of hears of which cheat of hears of white one cheat of hears of which cheat of hears of white of the age of Manch of t

All the time I was fetching the coal and dressing the dinner my imagination was on fire with fancies of the treasure in this ship. What, then, was the treasure in the run, if indeed it were there?

I was mechanically stirring the sauce-Frenchman suddenly sat up on his mat-
