N this contennial year of Robert Fulton's steamboat invention several gigantic ocean steamships, marking vast advances upon all predecessors, have been completed. The latest is the greatest. It is the Lusitania of the Cunard line. Mere figures tell little of the marine marvel which soon begins her voyages between England and the United States. The Lusitania is 790 feet long, 88 feet wide and has a plated depth of 60 feet. She made a speed of 25 knots on her trial trip. She has nine decks. The hull is divided into 175 water tight compartments, render-ing the vessal practically unsinkable. Placed end to end the main frames and beams in the skeleton of the craft would extend thirty miles. To rivet the steel plates to the beams 4,000,000 rivets, aggregating 500 tons in weight, were required. The Lusitania has four great funnels, each twenty-four feet in diameter. She will carry more than 2,000 paterners and a crew of 400 men.

It rises above the sea and the sea and is visible in clear weather bout 12 miles Pratas island in connection with the cellent anchorage afforded by Pratas eef, would be very serviceable to the apanese should their navy operate in the water adjacent to the Phillipines. The reef, the northeast point of which is about 11 miles from the Island is a wind barrier of circular form, inclosing a lagoon with water of from 5 to 10 fathoms. It is thickly studded with coral knolls around its edge, but has mparatively clear water near the middle. The reef is about forty miles in cir-cumference and between one and two miles in breadth. There are two chan-nels leading into the lagoon, one on either side of Pratas Island. The south channel is far the better, being wider and deeper and free from Coral knolls. The north channel is about three miles wide between the island and the break-ers. There are several good anchorages wide between the island and the break-ers. There are several good anchorages in the northeast monsoon in from 10 to 20 fathoms of water, the position abreast of the south channel being well adapted for naval purposes. The war and navy department offi-cials say that they have no official information about this new acquisition of the Japanese nation and that the
