The government should encourage the farmer as far as possible, and by building up the rural districts provide markets for manufacturers.

Dr. Roche of Marquette upbraided the government supporters for catering to narrow sectionalism by advocating so many different policies. The liberals had resorted to disgraceful methods in order to gain their point, going as far as to denounce their country and to give Americans pointers as to how they could strengthen their hold on Canada. Their history was one continuous disregard of all promises by which they won their way to power. When depression came, the government would find it hard to curtail expenditure. In behalf of the people of the west, he expressed confidence in Mr. Borden, whom they knew as a broad-minded man, who spoke his sincere convictions. He contrasted the opposition leader's utterances to those

He scored the administration for reporting the question of reciprocity, and asked if the basis of trade was to be the American dollar instead of the English shilling. The government was an aggregation of political mountebanks, whose claims were as absurd as they were groundless.

Mr. Roche of Halifax contended that Borden's amendment was not needed in the country, which was in a most prosperous condition. All classes were progressing under the liberal policy. He invited the opposition leader to submit a draft of a tariff embodying the ideas of the conservatives as to what changes could be made. He could not understand where the conserva-
