Over his arms the sorcercr carried a large white cloth, and the boy bore a red cushion on his head. Both bowed profoundly, and the sorcerer having uttered some cabalistic words spread the cloth some cabalistic words spread the cloth glace the cushion upon it. This being a ccomplished he scated the boy upon the cushion and began to tie the cloth about him, knotting it over his head until he and the cushion were one huge bundle, when with furious cries and oaths he beat it with a knotted club that he had fastened to his waist, while the poor child's moans filled the whole tent; and forced from us exclamations of hor ror, although we felt assured that it was all part of some trick, and that no blows really tell upon te boy.
