True Irishmen and Irish Americans, says Peter McCorry in the Irish American Weekly, always relish a good story of O'Connell. I think I can tell them an interesting one: It was in the early summer of 1843, if memory serves aright, that O'Connell determined on paying a visit to Belfast. He had long promised the sturdy Celts of the "Black North" a visit, and the time was propitious to redeem the Theatre, but the multitude could not be present and they wished to see him. A billiard room was attached to the hotel There were no railroads in those days connecting Dublin with the "Athens of Ireland" - a name beas a sort of wing to the main building. This offshoot was only one story high, and had a flat roof of about thirty stowed by Lady Morgan derisively on Belfast—and so O'Connell posted the entire distance. As he approached Hillsborough, the seat of the Down-shire family, distance ten miles from appeared with a dozen gentlemen. Tom Steele and Matthew Ray had arrived from Dublin that morning and Belfast, he alighted from his carriage and dismissed his driver. This was on a Saturday, two days before the publicly appointed time of his arrival. nell received then and there. There were fully ten thousand people-that is The ruse was necessary in order to deceive the Orangemen around Lisburn and Broomhedge, who had threatened O'Connell's life. Arriving at Hillsfavorite topic: "Repeal and Irish Manufactures." During his speech he took from his breast pocket what ap-peared to be an India silk pocket hand-kerchief and wiped his great massive forehead borough, apparently on foot, he saun tered into the Downshire Arms hotel and ordered a "conveyance" to Belfast. Entering into conversation with the hostler, who was also to be the driver of the "conveyance," an inside, or covered, jaunting car, he inquired carelessly about the news.

"Nothin' very strange hereabouts," replied the busy hostler, "exceptin' some talk an'stir consarin' O'Connell's visit here on Monday next. "Ah ! the old agitator, I believe. I have heard about him," said O'Connell.

"Yes, sir; an ould agitator he is indeed; keeping the country in tur-moil, him an' his blasted repale business. But if he comes this way-an' there's no other road for him to come by-he'll get such a bombastin' as he wont't forgot for many a day to come." "Serve him right," chuckled O'Connell.

"An' our master has cautioned all aroun' here if he should come for A CHANGE OF HORSES to refuse him, an' order him off the premises." "Serve the old agitator right," again chuckled O'Connell. "Ready, yer honor," and O'Connell entered the 'conveyance.'"

The couple of hours' ride was over a road as level as a billiard table, and through a bit of country that for pastoral beauty has few equals, even in Ireland. The hedges had on their summer dress of hawthorn blossoms, the meadow lands were covered with daisies and shamrocks vying with each other in beauty and color ; the clear atmosphere was tinged here and there smoke from the turf fires of the with farm houses, sweet smelling and grateful to every sense. Arrived in Belfast, the driver was

After allighting, O'Connell kept comically viewing the driver, and handed him a "tip" of five shillings. there was not the slightest confusion manifested.
