Short Routes Across the Atlantic. Baby

bear in mind the three great divisions of ocean traffic; the conveyance of mails, the carriage of passengers and he shipment of freight. For postal nmunication the great essential is speed, short distances, certainty and whilst speed is of importance, th greatest point, however, is comfor and luxury. This is amply provided for Americans in the splendid ships of the Cunard and other lines, and by these ships the great bulk of ocean passengers will always travel. If we look at the map we will see at once that the shortest routes between England and America lie between Ireland and Newfoundland and Ireland and the Labrador, at the Straits of Belle Isle. A project is now on foot and a from below Quebec to Forteau, Labrador, or some port in the neighbour hood. With the fastest steamers this would bring Quebec and practically all North America with three and onehalf days from Ireland. For summe passages this is an ideal route, and in speed would beat all other routes, bu owing to ice conditions it could only be run in summer. I firmly believe that this project will be carried out; besides its value as a mail route along the north shore of the Gulf of St. Lawrence it will open up a veri table summer paradise for the tourist and the sportsmen, lovely new watering places with a cool summer climate and splendid rivers abounding in salmon and trout. The alternate route are available all the year round and nearly as short as the Labrador scheme is from some point in Ireland to Trepassey. It is well known that the whole ocean traffic on the North Atlantic in great circle sailing passes Cape Race more or less distant. With the aid of the Marconi the ship could be located, met by a powerful ocean tug, passengers and mails could be transferred to Trepassey and railhead. Supposing this route is even taken up seriously as the really shortest mail route by the Dominion and Newfoundland Governments much can be done to improve it. For instance, instead of the long detour north on our railway, a direct line could be built straight from Piper's Hole to Port aux Basques saving 200 miles. Besides shortening the route this new ine would touch at the heads of all our Southern and South Western Bays
