

come and was supplied with all the particulars. But tell me, what instructions do you bring about the funeral?"

"No instructions at all, sir," answered Matthew, as he sorrowfully shook his head. "I have come to take the body to Ardgowan. His death makes Captain Stephen master there now, and he orders me to travel night and day. So, if you please, I shall call up the men, and we will carry the coffin to the house."

"Did my cousin send no message with you?" asked Lucy, in surprise.

"No, Mrs. Bruce, I am sorry to say he sent no message. I thought it might be an overlook on his part, and asked him if he had none to send, and he said—No."

"Not even to say when the funeral was to take place?" persisted Lucy.

"No, mam, not even that."

"Cruel, oh, cruel and heartless!" she murmured. "Is this a time for showing the old pride? And in the circumstances, too, Kenneth should be at the funeral."

"And so I shall," said Kenneth, firmly. "As representing you, I have as much right to attend the funeral as your cousin and they shall not hinder me."

"This for Mosses to-morrow," he added, addressing the factor, "and I shall take my rightful place by the side of George's grave."

Matthew, faithful to the instructions he had received, would scarcely wait to take tea with Lucy and Kenneth, and within an hour of his arrival the body was taken out and placed in the hearse under the eyes of the silent spectators who had come up from the village.

In silence, too, Matthew took his leave, and the hearse and the gig went away at a slow pace along the road.
