CHAPTER XXII.

A FOUL DEED—THE MISSING ONE.

George crossed the park as if treading upon air. What extreme emotion, what contrasts of feeling had he endured that night? His soul had been shaken as it had never been shaken before, and now he was exalted to the seventh heaven of delight and joy.

Lillias might be his. That was the rapturous prospect which had opened up to him—and opened, too, out of the densest darkness. It was a prospect which he had not dared to contemplate before, for though he loved Lillias with all the strength of his nature, and had also received the assurance of her affection, he had not dreamed it possible that she could ever become his wife. Wealth, station, and her father's pride placed her at an unmeasurable inaccessible distance. They might love, but could never wed. No power on earth could prevent their hearts from twining round each other; considerations of prudence or safety, or any other worldly influence, could not keep them from yielding to the impulsive outflow of affection; but they were impotent to resist the external opposition to their union, and George had never been sanguine enough to expect it.

Never till now; but now the expectation was raised—the gulf of distance seemed to be passable—the power of opposition shown not to be invincible—the vision had arisen of Lillias and himself standing before the altar to be made one for ever.

This, and the other pleasant surprises of the evening, produced in his spirit the intensely joyous feeling we have indicated, and occupied his thoughts to an extent which made him oblivious of all outward things.

His astonishment had not yet ceased at the discovery—the revelation rather—that Harry Markham was the brother of Lillias. Such a realisation was delightful as it had been—undreamed of, and of itself provided food for very happy thoughts. What a light of explanation did the fact also throw on the conduct of Lillias—the manner in which she received him at first—the ease, the frankness, the kindness, with which she met him. This conduct had not, indeed, struck him as odd or unfamiliar—gratitude and pleasure preventing him from seeing it in that light; but now he could see that it did not spring alone from natural goodness of her nature. It was due rather to her intimate knowledge of his own character and history, and to the deep friendship subsisting between him and her brother. She really met him that first day in the library as one whom she had already known very thoroughly—one whom she could trust to the utmost—one whose noble qualities had all been made known to her. It was not wonderful, therefore, that she had made advances to him with such frank and charming freedom, though certainly others that himself—the interested party—would have been tempted with their ignorance to have characterised her conduct as wanting in that reserve and modesty, so becoming in a maiden, at her first acquaintance with a youth of the opposite sex.

Under the influence of the delicious thoughts with which his mind was overflowing, George walked on, unheeding of the direction he took, and it was not till a stone fence stopped his further progress that he became conscious of the fact that he had gone far out of his way. He was near the edge of the ravine, but at considerable distance above Matthew Greigson's cottage, and at a point where he scarcely remembered of having ever been. He smiled to himself when he understood his position, and, turning round, struck into a broken and long disused path, which judged would lead him by the brow of the slope to one of the better beaten footpaths which wended down the ravine, and by which he would ultimately reach his temporary abode.

He had proceeded some distance along this tangled and grass-grown path, and had again become absorbed in his happy thought, when the rustle of a footstep behind caught his ear, and before he could turn to see what it might be, a heavy stinging blow descended on the back of his head, his brain reeled, a sudden darkness and confusion overtook him, and he fell to the ground insensible, just in time to escape a second blow from the weapon, which was raised to repeat the stroke.

George lay on the ground motionless, and over him bent the muffled form of a heavy-built man, grasping with his two hands the heavy cudgel with which the murderous stroke had been inflicted.

The Kansas Pacific Railway Company have sold to an Englishman, Mr. George Grant, of London, twenty-four square miles of land, upon which he intends to build a town and found a colony.
