Mr. Charlton Delivers a Strong

Address on Reciprocity.

The High Tar Side Afraid to Declare Itself One Way or the Other.

OTTAWA, May 4.—A large number of petitions were presented to-day, many of them from Methodist and Presbyterian churches overthe Dominion, praying for a prohibitory law.

Mr. Charlton's speech on the resumption of the debate on the address in reply was the event of the afternoon. The member for North Noriolk received a hearty round of applause on rising. He began a very effective attack on the policy of the Government by a reference to the manner in which the elections had been sprung upon the people. He pointed out by a plain, straightforward reference to facts that the dissolution of the House, in view of the reciprocity negotiations was entirely unnecessary. The Government had three successive times trampled down the the rights of the people of this country in cutting short the lives of its parliaments, and had on each occasion allowed political expediency to overrule the object of the dissolution, he declared, was simply to forestall public opinion. "Now," added Mr. Charlton, "we are here to consider this matter and probe it to the bottom. We are here, moreover, to ask the Government what it intends to do. The Government what it intends to favor reciprocity. It has gone to the second of the contract of the c ask the Government has professed to do. The Government has gone to the favor reciprocity. It has gone to the country with this profession. They have adopted a platform, they have induced the people to believe that they intend to give them reciprocity, and that the Government is as likely to obtain it as the Opposition, consequently there is a great majority of the members who are supporting the Government on the assurance that they are likely to obtain it. If the Government want reciprocity they would have to accept it upon the lines advocated by the Liberal party—upon no other terms would they obtain it."

Hon. Mr. Bowell—Tell us what they are,
Dr. Landerkin—Tell him what he is.

Laughter.)

Mr. Charlton—The honorable gentleman is evidently fishing for information. He would tell the honorable gentleman nothing. He did not believe that the party opposite knew what their terms were. He believed they were all at cross purposes. One was in favor of this thing, and another was in favor of that. He would make the promise on behalf of his side of the House that they would assist the Government for the sake of securing to the country the almost inestimable priviledge of better trade relations with the great nation to the south of us. (Opposition cheers.) This being the case, and their disposition being to help the honorable gentleman and his party, he thought they ought to tell the House hew far they would go. When the Government paraded before the country, as it had done time and again, its willingness to renew the reciprocity treaty of 1854, it was simply deceiving the people by making them believe in that which could not be obtained. What they wanted was a treaty whereby they could exchange the products of their labor for the products of our labor, and unless we were willing to negotiate a treaty of this kind we would get no treaty at all. If, continued Mr. Charlton, the Government did not go farther than reciprocity in natural productz, they might as well keep their commissioners at home. The Minister of Finance had said the door was open for the prequiation of a treaty of reciprocity.

Mr. Foster—I will take the responsibility.

Mr. Charlton proceeded, saying that the Government at Washington had received no such proposal at the time the dissolution was forced upon the country. Mr. Charlton adverted in severe terms to the tactics employed by the Government to retain

LABOR AGITATION.

Liberal policy did not contemplate Canada doing more than negotiating a treaty which shall be agreed to by both countries before it is ratified, and shall be binding alike on both. The honorable Minister had said that unrestricted reciprocity plus commercial union would lead to annexation. Why should it? Mr. Charlton asked. The honorable Minister did not make it clear. If reciprocity were not advantageous to the people of Canada would they want to perpetuate it by annexation? The honorable Minister had conceded the value reciprocity would be by saying the country would, by means of it, become enamored of its fruits and seek to perpetuate them Referring to the argument that the Liberal Italian Stevedores To Be Tabooed in New Orleans.

He believed in the policy which benefited ninety-nine one-hundredths of the people. The First Minister the other evening had read an extract from a letter written by the Hon. Edward Blake. The First Minister had not read to the House the whole of the letter, and Mr. Charlton proceeded to read to the House the scathing denunciations in the letter first of the Government then of their policy and its effect upon the country. Turning to the charge of conspiracy urged in the public prints against the Liberal policy, The lumber shovers on the docks at Cleveland, Ohio, are still idle, and the wholesale lumber dealers refuse to treat with them as an organized body. It had been debated in the House; it was the policy that would yet achieve success. (Applause.)

Mr. Charlton ridiculed the substitute for reprotity which the Finance Minister had sought in the West Indies. With regard to the argument that reciprocity would discriminate against herself. The Opposition, he declared, have faith in Canada. They desired to promote the best interests of Canada and put things Canadian on a better footing before the world. They were offering a policy that would make Canada prosperous. (Applause.) He continued that the Liberal party was loyal to Canada.

Mr. Taylor further announced that the Government would accept the Alliance resolution as a want of confidence motion, and call upon their supporters to vote it down, which may or may not be important in proportion as to just how far Mr. Taylor was speaking as chief Government whip.

An immense deal of party feeling was shown, several Conservative members accusing Secretary Spence of using the machinery of the Alliance in the Liberal interest, which charge Mr. Spence promptly denied. Then the members of Parliament were inclined not to take their orders from the outside Alliance men, demanding that the outside Alliance men, demanding that the oresolution be submitted to a caucus of Parliamentaries alone; but Mr. Spence cracked pretty vigorously the whip of a possible independent prohibition party, and they came silently into line.
