A Want Ad Appointment With Inquirers

Ezra Stone, viewing his correspondence school textbooks. "I certainly do need the money-right away. The rub is, there isn't any time I have to show the books to people.

"Suppose I run a Want Ad on the books. I'm not here at my room all through the day. Every evening this week is spoken for. Two lodge meetings. An invitation out to Dick Johnson's for Wednesday evening. Thursday evening I take Eva to the movies. Friday nighthe paused. Friday night was clear.

The reader who thinks he hasn't time to answer inquiries or show offered goods usually can manage to, if he will figure closely. It is easy to word one's Want Ad to help solve the problem. What young Stone did was to describe his books in a Want Ad, and then, since he could not handle phone inquiries—conclude, "Ezra Stone, Room 367, Gem Hotel, Friday evening after 7." He inserted his Want Ad for three days prior to Friday, got dinner out of the way early that evening, and was on deck at 7 o'clock waiting for inquirers. They came-several. The books all were sold at 8:30. When you are pressed for time, yet wish to sell, describe your offering well and then make a Want Ad appointment with interested people—setting a time, if possible, several days in advance. Advertise in the interim. With a definite time named in the Want Ad, a large proportion of interested parties will be able to suit their own conven-

A good general policy always when using Wants Ads is to make it. as easy as possible for inquirers to do business with you. Give readers as wide an opportunity to call on you as you can. If you can't handle inquiries through the day, but can evenings, say, "Any evening after 6:30," rather than a single named evening. "If you will be at home or office every day in the week except one day, "Any day except Wednes-

Having very little open time, however, should never prevent you from using a Want Ad. In your message make an appointment with
