

be greatly missed by the promising young Nobleman for whom he acted as Secretary. We shall refer to the history of the deceased more fully in our next."

"On the same day, and almost at the same hour as those on which the death of Mr. Ryerson occurred, and strange to say, in the same building as that in which he died—the granite Bourse—an elderly and well known lady departed this life. It has been currently reported that Miss Morton, as she was called, was in reality the daughter of the detestable would be assassin of the first Marquis of Gagetown. There is some reason to believe that the report is true, but if it is, we will do the deceased the justice to state, that, by her amiable conduct and her constant active charity, which was particularly noticeable in a heretic, she did much to efface the black mark of her origin."
