Mr. P I T T's Administration.

T
HERE is no period in our history more interesting than Mr. Pitt's administration ; nor any that has been more glorious. It exhibits an unparalleled series of surprizing events ; a wonderful and extensive scene of victory and success ; an amazing view of ministerial abilities and penetration ; a full exertion of the secret springs of action, in both offensive and political measures ; an indefatigable attachment to business, prompted and guided by the strictest principles of duty, honour and integrity ; and a patriotic zeal, that diffused a noble thirst for glory and conquest wherever the British arms adventured.—This is the public opinion ; the opinion of all candid and independent men, who are not attached to any party, nor have any interest to gratify ; but speak their sentiments as naturally arising from a reflection of the many
