HELENE'S MARRIED LIFE

BY MAY CHRISTIE

Copyright, 1920, by the McClure Newspaper Syndicate

XXIII.—Tony's Tale of the Night.

The three of us partook of tea. Alice and her husband seemed so happy in each other's company that I felt like an intruder.

After the fireless meal was over, I wandered round to the garage, and saw if the car is ready.

"No, dear," said Alice, "and you will wear it for the evening will be chilly." Out in the hall I found more than Tony, looking very sick and span, and carrying a letter in his hand. He had strolled over from Thorny Grange.

"Alice is in the drawing-room with her husband," I said curiously. I wasn't in a mood for Tony and his blarneying.

"It's you I've come to see," remarked that young man imperiously. He fixed his bold eyes on my face.

"Then I'm afraid you'll be disappointed. For I'm motoring to the railway station to meet the evening train."

"Blarney creature! You don't mean to say you're going away?"

"No! My errand is a charitable one."

"Then may I come with you, my pretty maid?" he chanted flirtatiously, to meet the occasion. One day of his perpetual flippancy. Also there was a determined glint in his bold eyes that told of a definite desire for love-making.

And I was actually going to meet my mother-in-law! If I hadn't been so worried over Jim, the situation would have been amusing. Poor Tony! If he only knew!

As I have remarked before, I strongly suspect that astute young man of mercenary motives. My income, when in stage parlance, is a large one. As Tony's wife, I certainly should have to work. The rest of the periods would be few and far between.
