MAINE STATION FOR AERIAL COAST PATROL

Addressing a great meeting in Bangor last week, on the subject of national defence Rear Admiral Robert E. Farley said:

"There is another way in which we can protect the coast of Maine and at once. That is by subscribing to the fund for the establishment of the Maine station of the aerial coast patrol system, which is now in the hands of a state wide committee of representative men."

And this is something in which our Maine women as well as men can help. The system has received the approval of the President, the Secretary of War and the Navy, our Maine senators and congressmen and military and aeronautical experts. It is a vital feature of our national defense, in regard to which there is no division of opinion.

The sub-division of the system into sections of convenient miles, bringing the expense of each section within the means of each community.

The idea itself, in briefest terms, is the division of our entire coast from Eastport to the Rio Grande and from San Diego to Puget Sound, into convenient sections or "beats," each beat in time of emergency to be patrolled continuously by a powerful hydro-aeroplane with driver and observer, equipped with wireless.

Such a machine, driving along its section at a distance of 50 to 60 miles from the shore, can detect the approach of an enemy's ships miles further out, and by means of its wireless, convey information as to their number, character and course to the shore stations, this giving the necessary advance notice to prepare for attack.

When the system is in operation there will be no need of the costly and dangerous whirling shuttles, the eyes of the nation, ceaselessly weaving their curtains of protection round the entire country.

With such a system in operation, a surprise attack upon our coasts will be an impossibility.

The idea is to get the sections of this system established by private initiative, and later they can be either taken over by or co-ordinated with the government.

The immediate result will be the acquisition of a considerable number of hydro-aeroplanes, available for government use without burden to the government, and a material increase in the number of aviators available for government service, also without burden to the government.

What we are now trying to do is to establish the first station of this system here in this state, at the eastern extremity of our coast line.

It is believed that this Maine station, the first of the kind, can be made a model pattern and that the success of this effort to install it, will prove such a powerful stimulus and exert such a controlling influence as to result in the establishment of a continuous series of stations by the various communities along our coasts, until the entire coast line from here to Puget Sound is covered and protected.

The materialization of such a coast- ward system by private means, ready for taking over or co-ordination by the government.
