There were combined with the curd, depended its stability for cheese making purposes. There wer forms of curd and weak forms, and by strong form he meant a curd which possessed in a high degree the two properties, tenacity and at the same time to expand and contract, and specially to contract. They are all of them in the habit of using a press as an adjunct to cheese making, and he ventured to say the worse the cheese maker the more use he made of the press, and the better the cheese maker the more use he made of the press, and the better the cheese maker the less use he made of it. And the reason was that a well-handled curd possessed the property of contracting on the whey it contained, so as to very largely climinate it by the process of spontaneous contraction, so long as the curd was maintained at a proper from mature.
