WORK OF THE WOMEN. HE WIVES CHIEFLY RESPONSIBLE

FOR HOMESTEAD'S STRUGGLE. Words of the Wife of a Striker Faith-

> It is the women of Homestead who are chiefly responsible for the continu-ance of the great strike in the Carnegie It is undoubtedly the fact that not ess than one-third of the workers would long ago have given up the struggle had it not been for their wives. This one-third, with the other men who are and have been willing to give up the fight, would be more than enough to officially declare the strike off.

declare the strike off.

Many good stories of the part the women have taken and the part they are now taking are told, but few of them have found their way into print.

A group of mill-workers stood on a street corner taking last night. Said one: "Boys, do you know what is keeping me out on this strike? I'll tell you. It is the dying message of my little wife.

'I went out on the strike with the

for two whole days in swife refused to see him, notwithstanding his reformation. Then she permitted him to come home on probation. In response to his pleadings that he had only returned to work for her sake and to prevent her suffering from want, she said she would rather die of starvation than be discraced. Hisgraced.

Matters in the household are still in a strained condition. She has not quite trilly forgiven him, and she declares she never can think as much of him as she being tied up for life to a black sheep," and all the girls shivered in unison.

"Well. my brother John would have gone back, I do believe," said another of the girls, "if mamma and me hadn't got after him. He said there was no chance left of winning the strike, and he was going to work, but mamma and me told him plain that if he deserted he need never come home again, for we didn't want to see him, and we wouldn't, either. So he said he would wait until didn't want to see him, and we wouldn't, either. So he said he would wait until the men won. Of course, they will win."

There is another case similar to the one mentioned by the first of this party of girls. The names are omitted, but it is none the less true and the relatives of the young woman tell it with some pride. The heroine, a pretty, blackeyed miss, popular in Homested social circles, and a fine-looking young man, employed by the steel company, were employed by the steel company, were engaged to be married, and, had all gone well, the ceremony uniting them in marriage would have been performed well, the ceremony unitarian marriage would have been performed early in September.

When the company called upon its clerical force to go into the mill and assist in getting things into shape preparatory to making a start with nonunion men, the young man was among the first to obey. As luck would have it, he found himself engaged upon work which had been performed, prior to the lock-out, by his sweetheart's brother, who is a member of the union.

When the young lady heard of this her indignation went up into the nineties. Womanlike, she had a good cry. This formally gone through with, she dried her eyes and with a stamp of ler foot declared to her parents that she would "never, no never, marry a black sheep."

According to the German experiments food equal to 2 per cent. of the weight of an animal must go first to heep."

"But he had to do this work in order things stood, which he did when he called that very evening, he tried to square himself by promising to leave the company's employ, but it was too late. Finding his pleadings were of no avail, the discarded lover very philosophically decided that he couldn't afford to lose a good job and a wife in one week, so he returned to work the next morning. He performs his duties with a pen in his hand and a misfit engagement ring in his vest pocket.

The young lady made a bonfire of a bushel or more of his love letters, and called in all the neighboring girls to see called in all the neighboring girls to see them burn. After the fire they had an indignation meeting, at which he was thoroughly denounced, and then a lunch was served by the disengaged young back to work are made to suffer by the wives of the men who are still holding out. First, every influence is brought to bear on them to induce their husbands to quit, and when unsuccessful, the women are ostracized. Whenever they appear on the street they are called names, and bodily harm is threatened. Sometimes children are sent into the street with instructions to throw mud at them at them.

In two cases that are known it has been necessary for the men to leave the mill and take their families from the town for fear that the threats of harm mill and take their families from the town for fear that the threats of harm will be carried out.

When the Pinkerton men on the barges surrendered, it will be remembered that they were set upon and beaten by the mob. That mob was made up chiefly of women. All the women who took part in that riot have been moving heaven and earth to keep any of the men from going back to work.

On every occasion before the arrival of troops, when the alarm was sounded, it was a common sight to see women running through the streets with rifles in their hands searching for their husbands or fathers or brothers.

The night of the first false alarm a Herald reporter was standing near the railroad depot, and a very pretty young woman dashed past him and forced a rifle into the hands of a man standing near. "Here, John;" she said, "it's all right; I loaded it myself; go now and use it; make every shot you fire count and don't come back to me beaten."

The reason for this determination on the part of the Homestead women is a very interesting question, and one that is not easy to answer.—Pittsburg correspondence Boston Herald.

It is the dying message of my little wife.

"I went out on the strike with the rest of the boys. As you know." it caught me at a bad time, for I didn'th have a cent. I had been sick for a long time, as some of you know.

"Well, it was looking so blue that I was on the point of giving in several times, but my wife, she says to me: Don't. We scratched along somehow, and she even took in work to help out. Well, she took sick and died—that was two weeks ago—and when she was on her deathbed she says to me: 'Jim, you wanted to go back to work to keep us from suffering, but I knew that by so doing you would sacrifice your honor. We've suffered together, and I'm going to our Father above, but before I go! want you to promise me that you would strike to the union. Promise me that you would show that the died. "I tell you, boys, 'I'll stick to the sight. After that, what else can I do? Do you think I could have the face of that dead woman glaring at me all the time, and hear her saying. 'Stick to the union, Jim,' and all the while going back on the union? No, sir.'

The morning of the great fight with the Pinkertons one woman called her husband and told him to go out and fight. She urged him not to lose a minute. Her son was at home on a visit. He wanted to go, too, but she wanted him to stay at home with her. He went in spite of her protests. He was carried home to her, it was believed, mortally wounded.

Still she urged her husband on and kept him in the field nearly all the day. He is now accused of murder, while she continually urges the men to stand firm and not give in.

When the company posted its notices inviting its men to return to work a young man who had been married less than a year was the first to apply. He was a mechanic and had no affiliation whatever with the Amalgamated Association. His services were accepted.

He stayed in the mill three days and then decided he would go home and see his wife. He found the house barred sgainst him. His wife was in and the door was locked. He knocked. She answered, and

He stayed in the mill three days and then decided he would go home and see his wife. He found the house barred against him. His wife was in and the door was locked. He knocked. She answered, and when she saw him waiting for admittance she banged the door in his face and sereamed, "Go away! go away! I don't want anything to do with you; you are a black sheep."

"Mollie, Mollie!" he cried, "what is the matter with you? I am your husband."

"You are no husband of mine," answered the woman. "I don't want you and won't have you; you are a black sheep. I won't live with you."

The young man went away to a neighbor's, where he was informed by the lady of the house that he deserved all he got and more. He finally promised he would not go back to work in the mill, and this woman agreed to intercede for

A crowd of young women were standing in the Homestead postoffice discussing the strike. "I gave him the go-by last night," said one. "I can't stand a black sheep."

"Were you going to marry him?" asked one of the other girls.

"It wasn't exactly settled," was the reply, "but I tremble to think what a narrow escape I had. Just think of it, being tied up for life to a black sheep," and all the girls shivered in unison.

When the young man learned how things stood, which he did when he called that very evening, he tried to square himself by promising to leave the company's employ, but it was too late. Finding his pleadings were of no avail, the discarded lover very philosophically decided that he coundly 's first to leave the consumption of food, and can use up the discarded lover very philosophically any commensurate return, if the feedgrain remarkably fast without making any commensurate return, if the feeding is not done with judgment. On the other hand, under proper conditions, they can turn the grain to flesh with as handsome a margin for profit as can any stock on the farm." the hay is off, to run a sharp tooth harrow over it, sow it with timothy and roll it?—E. W., Brockville, Ont.

The Cultivator and Country Gentleman answers as follows: The course you propose is the only one you can adopt, and its success will depend on the present condition of the ground for being well pulverized in the operation. It would be important also to give an even top-dressing of barn manure, to be followed with the harrow and roller either before or after sowing the grass seed. A light manuring would be useful; a heavy one would give a strong growth. A Kemp manure spreader would do the spreading admirably. the hay is off, to run a sharp tooth har-

What is the difference in the value of a good cow yielding an annual profit of $24, and an extra cow yielding a profit of $50? Limit the milking period of a cow's life to six years, and take no account of progeny, and the net income from one is $114, while that from the other is $300; difference, $156. If the good cow cost $50, by compounding interest and insurance at ten per cent, we find her at the expiration of the term with a credit of $47.42. On the same basis the extra cow, if purchased at $140, would stand credited with $52. In other words, the extra cow would be a better investment at $140 than the Good vs. Poor Cows.

a better investment at $140 than the good cow at $50. The moral is, Breed only from the best bulls.—Farmer's Advocate, Sow Rye in September.

If you have a spare plot anywhere, sow it to rye in September, which will give the hens a share of green food late in—the season and also early in the spring. If you have changeable yards, sow one of them to rye. The spading of the ground alone is an advantage, and the manure will be sufficient for the thickest seeding possible—the thicker the better.—Mirror and Farmer.
