THE DRINKING SUNBONNET

How "Hoosier" Thirsty Ones Get Ahead of the Screenless Bar Law—A Tip for St. John.

Rushville, Ind., May 8.—Necessity is the mother of a very prolific family, but her latest offspring here, the "drinking sunbonnet," is conceded to be one of her most talented children of genius.

The sunbonnet came in when the saloon screen was abolished. Until a few weeks ago the saloons of Indiana were almost as scarce as they were plentiful a few years ago.

Along came county option, a law interesting the rights of voting out saloons with the inhabitants of any county. Result was that the drinking parlors went out like stars before a bright morning sun.

The county option law was repealed at the last session of the legislature, and now the prodigal saloons are returning to occupy their former haunts.

The local authorities in every community are laying down strict observance for the saloon keepers to toe. One of these local made ordinances provides that all screens and blinds which would tend to obstruct a full view of the saloon must be abolished.

This is the rule in Rushville. The argument for it is that it will cause many men to remain away from the saloons in the small towns, as they would not like to be seen standing at the bar with their liquor in hand. Rear entrances are likewise forbidden.

The screenless saloon had the desired effect. The most frequent free lunch did not bring custom to the rejuvenated saloons, and the proprietors who had made a big outlay of money, were at their wits' end as to how to trade and "get around" the ordinance which was driving them to distraction and bankruptcy.

Presently a "lady" approached the present King, and with what was meant to be a demure simper, asked for the pleasure of a dance.

"Go away, you hussy," was the royal retort; "I'm a lady myself, but I've lost my blessed handkerchief. Have a cigar."

Another amusing story, in which Queen Mary figured, is recalled. It was at a state ball at Buckingham Palace a few years ago. The late Prince Francis of Teck, the Queen's brother, went to a salon of a noble house and remarking that he was not dancing, asked if he could find him a few partners.

"No, thanks, old chap," was the reply, as the man, still a yawn, "dancing is such a bore, I think I will rest a little longer."

Presently the man in question—he is now a full fledged peer—ventured to approach the present Queen and request the honor of a dance. Her brother "Frank" however, had been before him.

"Thank you" was the reply of the Queen, with a cool glance at him, "but dancing is such a bore, as it is not."

His lordship went home.

"Put on your old gray bonnet With the side screens on it, And don't fall to stand sideways; You can put one over. Without going to Dover, As you did in the oldtime days." It is not an uncommon sight these days to look in a saloon and see the bar lined with men in sunbonnets drinking. It is impossible for passers-by to see their faces, and that they have defeated the purpose of the screenless saloon. And by the same token, the receipts of the saloons have increased and the owners are again on the way to prosperity.

Mr. and Mrs. Robt. B. Humphrey have moved out to Sunnyside Farm, the property near Jubilee Station, Nauwigawauk, overlooking the Hammond river, lately bought by them from the estate of the late S. Z. Dickson.

CORONATION SEATS AT HALF A FARTHING

This was the Price when the First Edward was Crowned, but it has Since Steadily Increased.

London, May 8.—In view of the prices which are being asked for Coronation seats, it is amusing to contemplate the steady increase in prices which has been going on from the time of William the Conqueror until now.

From the coronation of William I, at which it is curious to note no women were present, down to that of Henry III, a good place could be had for the smallest of the base copper coins brought over by the Normans.

The procession of Edward I. could be viewed in the streets with Richard the Lionheart, and the same price was paid under Edward III. The same rate of progress occurred with Richard II. and Henry IV., and again under Henry V., and the twopenny scale was maintained down to Henry VII. Queen Elizabeth I. and Queen Victoria.

Mary lived in an extravagant age, and those who wished to see them going to their crowning were compelled to spend a great deal, and this sum sprang up to sixpence for Good Queen Bess.

For the first two Stuarts a shilling was willingly laid out, and for the last two the rate was half a crown. For William and Mary, Anne and George I. a crown was paid, and when George II. was crowned there were lavish patriots who went up to half a guinea, and this sum sprang up to a guinea, and then to two guineas.

For William and Mary, Anne and George I. a crown was paid, and when George II. was crowned there were lavish patriots who went up to half a guinea, and this sum sprang up to a guinea, and then to two guineas.

At the Victorian coronation seven hundred seats in front of Westminster Abbey were let at a guinea, and many of these fetched a premium of two guineas before the auspicious day arrived.

It is not yet quite certain what form of souvenir will be selected by King George to commemorate the forthcoming visit to India, but it may be recalled that on the Christmas following his tour of the country as Prince of Wales he had a commemorative card specially prepared for circulation among his Indian friends and officials. The card containing it was of pure white kid, with royal monograms, while the Prince of Wales feathers were in each corner.

As regards Calcutta, the idea is that the permanent portrait of the King-Emperor shall represent him in the robes which he will wear at the Delhi Durbar in December next. A special commission will be given for this purpose and the artist will proceed to India in ample time, not with the royal cruiser, but by the ordinary route, so as to enable him to make preparations beforehand.

Isaac Snowman is engaged upon portraits of King George and Queen Mary in less formal surroundings, and several sittings have already been granted by them for this purpose.
