

and the other men had taken their seats when, as he was sitting down with a backward, and when the men behind him up he was dead. Dr. G. O. Baxter was summoned from the city, but his services were of course unnecessary.

Had Arranged for His Burial.

The eccentric character of Haggerty was shown in no better way than by the careful arrangements he had made for his own burial. He had arranged that he be buried in a small lot in the Lakeside cemetery. He was laid to rest on Wednesday, Dec. 11, the fifth anniversary of the hanging of his wife, to whose bringing to justice he had been the unwilling means.

There are many in the city who remember the fearful tragedy of 1879, and at the time it aroused great horror. The crime seemed almost inhuman, as the terrible character of the details of the crime, and so little precaution taken in removing the traces of their fearful work. The motive was pure robbery. The motive was pure robbery. The motive was pure robbery.

The book tells of the luring of McKenize to a house where Breen was wife and where he was to bring his wife. The book tells of the luring of McKenize to a house where Breen was wife and where he was to bring his wife.

"She is coming," McKenize asked, referring to Breen's wife. "She is," was the reply. "Well, she is pretty near."

"Well, she is pretty near," McKenize was not quite dead, however, and uttered a groan. Then Slavin hid him blow after blow upon the breast until life was extinct.

After telling of the murder of McKenize, the book tells of the inhuman murder of Mrs. McKenize and the four small children.

"Breen entered the door of the common sitting room where Mrs. McKenize and the children were. She was not surprised to see Breen, supposing, no doubt, that her husband was behind him. Instead of that husband, there stood there, unseen by her, her murderer, Slavin, the axe hidden behind his back, while he sneaked through the door and prepared to begin the slaughter.

"The picture presented by the room and its occupants was such as cheered the heart of man, and made ready for a long country road after dusk. The bright light of a cheerful fire, showed a mother and her family, their household duties now in every unrepresented place. The picture presented by the room and its occupants was such as cheered the heart of man, and made ready for a long country road after dusk.
