CONCLUBED. CHAPTER XXII.

HILDEBRAND'S STURY. In one of the vestibules of the convent of the Capuchins sat Hildeb and and Francis de Mora. They were both of them pale and somewhat weak, but their strength of body was fast returning. The young man was sitting by an open window, and apparently gazing out upon but a close observer might have noticed that his eyes had a vocant abstracted look—that he saw nothing beyond his own busy thoughts. His companion looked far different from what the did when first we saw him. Much of the heard was shorn from his face, his dress was less wild and extravagant, than before, and the events of the past four days had thrown a softening effect over his countenance. · Hildebrand, said Francis, turning from the window and looking upon his

There were two Carmelite monks with him. At first I refused to have anything to do with him, but he soon convinced me that he had no stratagem on foot for my harm, and I gave him audience. You may be sure that I was somewhat surprised when I knew his business. He wished me to enter into an engagement with him for enter into an engagement with him for the destruction of four Spanish officers against whom he had a grudge and whom he had occasion to fear. It was beyond his power to get hold of them, and he hoped to win me to his aid. The cardinal greatly mistook my character, but the mistook my character, but the wind long shruke broke from her lips.
