

I feel, however, a sufficient sense of security to be able to promise you, if you would accept it as a birthday gift, a continuance for so long a time as Margaret may be with you, of the amount which I have been sending to you for her. If anything should happen which would necessitate through her leaving, a change, within the year, I may have to make some re-adjustment in the light of the circumstances.

I should like you, however, to have the satisfaction of knowing that what I am giving you in the form of a birthday gift is something that relates itself immediately to your personal comfort and health in the matter of domestic service.

I should like, as well, to keep you supplied with vitamins for that time. I shall be glad if you will not fail to let me know whenever your existing supply is beginning to give out.

Your little visit to Kingsmere continues to be one of the happiest events of the year. I am so glad it meant what it did to the children, and grand-children as well as to yourself.
