For the Newly-Wed.

By RUTH CAMERON.

"Great goodness!" said the Author-Man to a newly-wed neighbor of ours, "didn't you hear what your wife said?"

"No," said the newly-wed neighbor, placidly removing his pipe, "was it anything important?"

"I should say so," said the Author-Man, "she said her new husband wasn't becoming."

"Well," said the neighbor, "don't you know she'll be telling you that you said her hat was a sight?"

"But I didn't say anything of the sort," objected the neighbor.

"You didn't deny it," broke in his wife.

They Store Them Up Against You.

"Ah!" said the Author-Man, triumphantly. "What was I telling you? She said it to see what you'd say, and when you didn't say anything, that meant that you thought it was unbecoming. Don't you know that lots of things women say are meant to be denied, and that if you don't deny them they store them up against you?"

"Are women like that?" said the newly-wed one, rather abashed.

"They're not a bit," protested the newly-wed's wife, "don't you believe him, dear!"

Never Let Such Statements Get By You.

"And didn't you just prove it?" retorted the Author-Man. "Take a leaf from my book," he went on, with the patronizing manner of the long-wed to the newly-wed. "All women want to be reassured when it is on that all the time. When I was first married, I let some of those things slip, and by-and-by they would be brought up to me. Now I never miss them. Sometimes I'll be reading or thinking, and not really hear what she says, and then I'll come to with a start and hear it echoing in my mind. I've got my sub-conscious mind so trained that it catches things like that and warns me.

Never Argue With A Woman Who Wants To Be Reassured.

"Another thing—never argue or be impatient with a woman when she wants to be reassured. Some of the things will sound perfectly unreasonable to you and you will want to argue with her. Don't do it. If she says, 'Do you really love me?' don't say, 'Would I be working all day to support you and coming home to spend my evenings with you if I didn't?' Just take her in your arms and tell her you love her. 'One day longer, one night stronger than I loved you, dear, before.'"

"Oh, I like that," cried the newly-wed wife, with her eyes shining. "where did you get it?"

"You see!" said the Author-Man.

The Rumanians Hold.

Falkenhayn has been halted and, at the moment, is being pushed back. Maybe he will recover and in turn push the Rumanians back, and they in turn will gain some advantage over him; it makes little difference. The eastern drive, the last offensive, failed the moment Falkenhayn and Mackensen were checked at all.

Hindenburg, who has always believed that the great effort must be made in the east, tried to make it as soon as he took command. He undertook to repeat the great smashes by which the Germans won their astounding successes for the first year and a half of the war. While the west front offered only a defense, the aggressive was to be in the east; there was to be another of those sudden and terrific avalanches of men upon a weak spot, hurling armies out of its path, irresistible until it had reached its goal. That was the history of the Russian and Serbian campaigns of 1915, and the history of the French campaign of 1914 until the avalanche was stopped at the Marne.

So Mackensen leaped at Rumania's back in the Dobruja, while Falkenhayn launched his masses at her throat in Transylvania. The inexperienced and overconfident Rumanian troops ran like the Union Army at Bull Run, but the panic lasted only long enough to exhort from King Ferdinand a terrified cry which proved his unfitness to his army and defeated old comrade, Peter of Serbia. The Rumanian army, green by war as it was, is credited with having as good stuff as any in Europe, and is beginning to show that it has. It stopped Mackensen, and now it has stopped Falkenhayn.

Whether Falkenhayn inflicts the next defeat or whether the Rumanians inflict it does not matter much. The drive has been stopped. A smash that does not smash all the way through becomes a deadlock. That is what happened at the Marne, and it is the best the Germans can hope for now. There are temporary successes in a deadlock, but a smash that fails cannot become a smash again. On the other hand, the Rumanians can hope for something better than a deadlock; they can hope, with constant reinforcement, to turn the Germans back and become Brusiloffs on a smaller scale.

Not only to the courage and good stuff of the momentarily panic-stricken Rumanians, but to the prompt and effective assistance of the Russians, is the check due. For once the Allies were not too late. Promptness was never before considered one of the Russian military virtues, and it was on the lack of it that those wonderful German psychologists built so confidently in their expectation of ending the war in 1914. Race psychology will have to go into the discard before this war is over; the slow Russian was prompt in the Balkans, where the nimble French and the awakened British had been too tardy to save Serbia. The Russians, however, would not have been the only troops to come to Rumania's aid if it had not been for the deadly threat in the rear that has held Sarrail's army motionless and clogged his steps when he did begin to move. That threat is Greece, and it explains the summary acts which the Allies have at last begun to commit in that country. If Rumania had fallen, it would have been Greece that destroyed her; Greece, by holding her rescuers back, Greece by breaking her treaty with Serbia, did what she could to destroy that ally of hers, but she could not have saved her in any case her part in the destruction of Rumania would have been effective and decisive. No wonder King Ferdinand begged the Allies to be less susceptible of Greece's feelings and to think more of Rumania, who had ventured her life in their cause.—N. Y. Times, Oct. 20.

SWEETEST WORDS.

"Inclosed find check!" The sweetest words that ever out-classed the song of birds! How they allay the widow's fears, and dry the orphan's briny tears! When sad and tired and short of kale, a letter comes by morning mail; like other letters it appears, with postage stamps and jinky smears. "No doubt," we sigh, "it is a dun; some frantic gent 'is after mon. These beastly bills we cannot pay take all the sunshine from the day, and makes us wish that we were dead, with stacks of granite overhead." And then, with languid hands we tear the envelope to see what's there, and out there comes a note by heck, with these brave words, "Inclosed find check!" Ah, then we bid farewell to woe, and like pine Brahms roosters crew, and to the soft drinks joint repair, and buy a quart of soapuds there. The sun once more is cutting hay, the gloomy clouds are blown away, the world is glad that was a wreck, changed by the words, "Inclosed find check."

And He Was "Some" Soldier.

London Daily News:—The poll is now authorized by the Journal Official to shave his moustache if he chooses. A great many French soldiers did so without official permission, but some officers had an invincible prejudice against the bare upper lip. One old martinet of this kind was the other day severely worried in an encounter with a young soldier whom he asked in a voice of thunder, "Have you ever heard of a good soldier without a moustache?" "Yes, sir," "Who?" "Napoleon."

NORWEGIAN SHIP DESTROYED

LONDON, TUESDAY.—The Norwegian sailing ship Skien was set on fire by the German submarine U-34 while the ship was on her way from Norway to land. Two of the crew were killed according to a Reuter dispatch from Ymuden, Holland, to-day. News was brought to Ymuden, according to the despatch, by the steamer Hector, which arrived at port with the captain and ten members of the crew of the Skien. These sailors were taken aboard U-34 from which they were transferred to the Hector.
