Desperate Remedies

By Thomas Hardy, F "A PAIR OF BLUE EYES," "THE TRUMPET-MAJOR," ETC.

On a green plot at the other end of the building grew two or three large, widespreading elm-trees, from which the sign was suspended—representing the three men called tranters (irregular carriers), standing side by side, and exactly alike to a hair's breadth, the grain of the wood and joints heing visible through the thin paint depicting their forms, which were still further disfigured by the red stains running downwards from the rusty nails above.

Under the trees now stood a cider-mill and a press, and upon the spot sheltered by the boughs were gathered Mr. Springrove himself, his men, the parish clerk, two or three men, grinders and supernumeraries, a woman with an infant in her arms, a flock of pigeons, and some little boys with straws in their mouths, endeavoring, whenever the men's backs were turned, to get a sip of the sweet juice issuing from the vat. Edward Springrove the elder, the land-lord, now more particularly the farmer, and for two months in the year a cider-maker, was an employer of labor of the old school, who worked himself. He was now engaged in packing the pomace into horsehair bags with a rammer, and Gad Weedy, his man, was occupied in shoveling up more from a tub at his side. The shovel shone like silver, from the action of the juice, and ever and anon, in its motion to and fro, caught the rays of the declining sun and reflected them in bristing stars of light.

Mr. Springrove had been too young a man when the pristine days of the Three Tranters had departed for ever to have much of the host left in him now. He was a poet with a rough skin; one whose sturdiness was more the result of external circumstances than intrinsic nature. Too kindly constituted to be very provident, he was yet not imprudent. He had a quite humorousness of disposition, not out of keeping with a frequent melancholy, the general expression of his countenance being one of abstraction. Like Walt Whitman he felt as his years increased.

"I forsee too much; it means more than I thought."

"I forsee too much; it means more than I thought."

"I forsee too much; it means more than I thought."

On the present occasion he wore gaiters and a leathern apron, and worked with his washirt-sleeves rolled up beyond his elbows, disclosing solid and fleshy rather than muscular arms. They were stained by the cider, and two or three brown apple-pips from the pomace he was handling were to be seen sticking on them here and there.

The other prominent figure was that of Richard Crickett, the parish clerk, a kind of Bowdlerized rake, who ate only the quantity of a woman, and had the rheumatism in his left hand. The remainder of the group, brown-faced peasants, who wore smock frocks embroidered around the shoulders with hearts and diamonds, and were girt round the middle with a strap, another being worn round the right wrist.

"Just a glimpse of him; but 'twas just enough to show me that he is not here for long."

"Why m't that be?"

"He'll never stand the vagaries of the female figure holden the reins—not he."

"She'd pay en well, 'said a grinder; "and tmoney's money."

"Ah, 'tis; very much so," the clerk re-

"Ah, 'tis; very much so," the clerk replied.

"Yes, yes, naibour Crickett," said Springrove," but she'll flee in a passion—the fat will be in the fire—and there's an end. Yes, she is a one." continued the farmer, resting, raising his eyes, and reading the features of distant apples.

"She is," said Gad, resting too (it is wonderful how prompt a journeyman is in following his master's initiative to rest) and reflectively regarding the ground in front of him.

"Tis a temper she hev, 'tis," the clerk replied. "Though I be a servant of the church that say it. But she isn't going to flee in a passion this time."

The audience waited for a continuation of the speech, as if they knew from experience the exact distance of it lay in the future. The clerk swallowed nothing as if it were a great deal, and then went on, "there's something between em; mark my words, saibors—there's some'at between 'em."

"I'd' know it. He came last Saturday, didn's he?"

"A did truly," said Gad Weedy, at the same time taking an apple from the hopper of the mill, eating a piece and flinging back the remainder to be ground up for cider.

"He went to church a-Sunday." said the

"And she kept her eye on en oll the service, her face flickeren between red and white, but never stoppen at either.
Mr. Springrove nodded and went to the press.

Mr. Springrove nodded and went to the press.

"Well," said the clerk, "you don't call her the kind of a woman to make mistakes in just tretting through the weekly service of God? Why as a rule she's as right as I be myself,"

Mr. Springrove nodded again, and gave a twist to the screw of the press, followed in the movement by Gad at the other side; the two grinders expressing by looks of the greatest concern that, if Miss Aldelyfte were as right whereh as the clerk, she must be right mised.

ENGLAND.

At Bilston, on Saturday afternoon week, John Wise, 37, iron worker, was committed for trial at the Assizes for the willful murder of Mary Davies, a married woman, at Deepfields in August last. The prisoner was enraged because his wife had run away with Mrs. Davies' son, a young fellow of 18, and helieving the matter he shot her with a revolver, causing her death, and then attempted to kill himself.

The Queen of Roumania was enchanted with her visit to Balmoral, and on her return to London she spoke with the utmost tenthusiam of the Queen's "motherly kindness" to her, and as soon as Queen Elizabeth gets settled at home she proposes to write a poem about her Majesty. Carmen Silva received from the Queen an almost life-size photograph of herself, besides presenting each of her ladies-in-waiting with valuable brooches, set with brilliants and Indian gems.
